Bible mavens tested on Yom Ha'atzmaut

Israel's 49th annual International Bible Contest (Chidon Hatanach) was held on Yom Ha'atzmaut in Jerusalem last week. Organized by the Israel Defence Forces' (IDF) chief education officer and the IDF Rabbinate, the Defence Ministry, Education Ministry, the Jewish Agency and the Jewish National Fund, teenagers from more than 22 countries vied for top honours. Elchanan Bloch of Netivot, Israel, won the competition, while two Canadians, Toronto's Aaron Goldberg of the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Charlie Friedman of Montreal's Hebrew Academy, placed fourth and ninth respectively. [Israel Sun photo]

JERUSALEM — The leading candidate in Egypt's presidential race said Sunday that the Camp David Accords should be consigned to history, describing the agreement as "dead and buried."

At a mass rally in southern Egypt, Amr Moussa, the former secretary general of the Arab League who is currently ahead in Egypt's race for president, spoke of the 1978 peace talks between Israel and Egypt, saying that "the Camp David Accords are a historical document whose place is on the shelves of history, as its articles talk about the fact that the aim of the agreement is to establish an independent Palestinian state."

Moussa went on to say that there is "no such thing" as the Camp David agreement.

"This agreement is dead and buried. There is an agreement between Israel and Egypt that we will honour as long as Israel honours it. The document that defines relations between Israel and the Arabs is an Arab initiative from 2002 whose advancement should be bilateral: step for step, progress for progress."

More than 600 people attended the funeral for Lewis, an accomplished jazz pianist who performed with jazz greats such as Oscar Peterson and Maynard Ferguson, as well as for Queen Elizabeth.

Trial Moved

BALTIMORE — Lawyers for two Baltimore Jewish brothers accused of beating a black teen withdrew a request to move the trial out of the city and requested a bench trial. The brothers had requested a change of venue because of perceived similarities between the case and the death of Trayvon Martin, a black Florida teen who was shot by a white neighbourhood watch patrolman now facing second-degree murder charges in a case that has received national attention. Avi and Eliyahu Werdesheim are accused of beating a 15-year-old boy in November 2010. Eliyahu Werdesheim, now 24, was a member of Shomrim, a Jewish neighbourhood watch group, at the time. The trial will continue in Baltimore in front of a judge with no jury. Both men have pleaded not guilty to charges of second-degree assault, false imprisonment and carrying a deadly weapon. They face up to 13 years in jail. According to police, Eliyahu Werdesheim told the black teen, "You don't belong around here," while his brother, now 21, threw the boy to the ground. Local black leaders have linked the case with the death of Martin.

Canadian Aboriginal Leaders Visit Israel

Ron Evans

WINNIPEG — Thirty young aboriginal leaders from Manitoba are in Israel to study culture and society in the Jewish state. The Youth Leadership Development Mission to Israel is running from April 29 to May 6.

Under the auspices of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, the aboriginal leaders are visiting Christian and Jewish holy sites, studying Israeli immigrant absorption and skating at Israel's only full-sized hockey rink, at the Canada Centre in Metulla.

They're also meeting with the Galilee branch of Kav Hazinuk (the Starting Line), a youth leadership development program funded by the Winnipeg federation.

"The objective... is to help develop leaders among First Nations youth," said trip leader Ron Evans, chief of Manitoba's Norway House Cree Nation. "I visited Israel for the first time last year, and I was overwhelmingly inspired. The Jewish People are the historic, indigenous people of Israel. For Canada's First Nations, Israel's story demonstrates how an ancient people can maintain their heritage while embracing the modern world, and in so doing, achieve self-determination."

Shelley Faintuch, community relations director for the Winnipeg federation and a CIJA associate director, said that "these highly motivated youths will return to their communities empowered with additional knowledge and leadership tools."

Yom Hazikaron
Yom Ha'atzmaut

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Israel's fallen were remembered on Yom Hazikaron, Israel Remembrance Day, and on the same evening, the 64th birthday of the Jewish state was celebrated in honour of Yom Ha'atzmaut.

"Suffering and redemption are inseparable for the Jewish People. We cannot have light without darkness, joy without sadness, comfort with bereavement, and if that is the story of our people, then it is the key to our survival," said Rabbi Daniel Korobkin of the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue of Toronto Synagogue (BAYT), where over 400 people gathered for the ceremony.

The April 25 event was hosted by Mizrachi Canada, in partnership with Emunah Women of Toronto.

The evening began with a tribute to Israel's fallen soldiers and victims of terror. "Although we are not in Israel, as lovers of Zion, we are duty bound to commemorate Yom Hazikaron," event chair Jack Samuel said. "To appreciate the incredible miracle and the joy of the Jewish state, we have to be mindful of those who paid the ultimate price to create, defend and sustain that state." Over 20,000 Israelis have been killed in combat since 1948.

Perlman's violin lifts the soul

Even before he had stroked one note on his slight but mighty violin, Yitzhak Perlman received a loud, effusive ovation from the audience that filled Roy Thomson Hall last week in Toronto.

That the renowned artist-musician was performing in Toronto on Yom Ha'atzmaut was a providential serendipity for some in the audience. For it added immensely to the personal celebration of the special day. At the age of 67, how many more visits to Canada lay ahead for the Israeli-born violinist? It was a rare opportunity to see and hear this exceptional individual, perhaps one of the most beloved and respected musicians in the world.

Playing alongside his student, Toronto Symphony Orchestra conductor Peter Oundjian, Perlman performed Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D Major, Op. 61.

Beethoven was already past the mid-point of his short life when he composed the concerto. And though it was written during a more mature period in the composer's life, it holds true to so much of the tempestuous, moody composer's music: rising tides of emotion, boldly expressed feelings, large, broad themes frequently contrasted by gentle lyricism and tender phrases.

Beethoven's music, this violin concerto included, is as deeply embedded into the canon of western music as the western horizon is to sunset. In both cases, one cannot conceive of the latter without the presence of the former.

As he awaited his cue from the score, Perlman sat patiently, looking out into the audience, violin resting securely between chin and shoulder, his hands not on the precious instrument but indifferently clasped together in his lap. His familiar full head of wavy, curly black hair is indeed still wavy and curly, but the black is now silver grey.

And then it happens.

Some three minutes into the allegro, the first movement of the concerto, Perlman brings the bow to the strings and music flows from the instrument like pixie dust pours from the magician's chalice in the old Walt Disney cartoons, lifting the listener's soul in ever-ascending arcs of sparkle and light.

As he plays, Perlman communicates with us, his expressions, his movements and the ever delightful sounds of his music an invitation to travel with him to faraway places of the heart. And if it is true, as Beethoven's younger contemporary Robert Schumann wrote, "Music's lofty mission is to shed light on the depths of the human heart," then the remarkable Perlman is a precious human flashlight shining gold and silver light into the many mysterious corners of the human heart's profundity.

During Perlman's solos, the more than 50 other musicians on the stage listened and watched with the intensity of students listening to their master. At one heavenly solo in the first movement, Perlman beckoned their re-entry into the music with delicate trilling by his left pinky. The many "dialogues" throughout the music between solo violin and other solo instruments or full orchestra were like tender-hearted conversations between lovers.

We cannot simply speak of Perlman's grasp of music because that suggests "mere" mastery of technique and technical requirements. Nor can we simply speak of his searing interpretations of music because that suggests "mere" expertise brought by constant repetition and routine.

Rather, there is very evidently something more, something additional, to Perlman. To be sure, he obviously does grasp the material and he obviously does bring insightful, moving interpretations to music.

In a way, Perlman himself becomes the instrument. And the violin "plays" him. In his hands, it draws out of this unique virtuoso ideas and suggestions, approaches and discoveries that bring us standing fully within what is important, elegant and beautiful in the music. And in so doing, he and his violin, also bring us more closely to the edge of seeing what may be important, elegant and beautiful in our own lives.

When the concerto ended, the audience was on its feet immediately shouting and clapping their thanks to Perlman. They stood without interruption in lusty applause for 10 minutes. Perlman returned to the stage two more times after he had concluded playing.

After the performance, two young people were overheard saying it had been a "privilege" to see and hear the grand maestro. An older individual, apparently more familiar with Perlman, said of the maestro that "he was in the zone tonight." Reflecting further, he added with a small nod of the head and a wistful smile, "It makes you believe in God."

Israeli flag flies over Queen's Park

Ontario celebrated the 64th anniversary of Israel's independence with a flag-raising ceremony on the front lawn of Queen's Park on Yom Ha'atzmaut last week. # Police fine Eitz Chaim stalker for trespassing

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

An Israeli man who had been trespassing at Eitz Chaim Day School on Patricia Avenue was sent to hospital last week to be evaluated for "mental health issues," Toronto police said.

Eitz Chaim staff and parents have been on high alert since April 19 when a man showed up at the all-boys branch of the school and began playing soccer with some of the kids during recess, said Rabbi Isser Pliner, dean of Eitz Chaim.

When the teachers asked him to leave the campus, he reluctantly complied.

"The next day, he came back at around 1:15 p.m. and he was asked to leave again, and he was a little more belligerent and it took a little more to get him to leave again."

Rabbi Pliner said when he confronted him, the man challenged him about why he had to leave school property.

"In the meantime, I was involved with Doron Horowitz, [director of national security infrastructure for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs], right from the get-go for some advice, and I involved the police right from the get-go," he said.

"He came back two hours later, and was again upset about the fact that the police had visited his house."

Rabbi Pliner sent two detailed e-mails to Eitz Chaim parents, describing what the man looked like and how his staff was handling the unfolding situation.

"The man is around 30 years of age and medium in size. He appears to be an Israeli Jew. He wears tzitzitis, but goes with a bare head. He lives on Patricia Avenue. He has made no attempt to be physical in any way," Rabbi Pliner wrote in an April 23 e-mail.

On April 24, the situation escalated when the man returned to the campus at dismissal time, taking pictures of the students and their parents' cars.

"He stirred a lot of attention," Rabbi Pliner said.

"The cops went to his house again and that is when they issued the trespass violation and fined him... He promised not to come back, but he's not necessarily all there... He promised, but no one is feeling that he may live up to that."

Det. Scott McKay of 32 Division confirmed that police gave the man a $65 trespassing ticket, but he was not formally charged with trespassing, which is a criminal offence.

He explained the process involved in having someone charged with trespassing. He said following a verbal warning by the property owners, the trespasser is then warned in writing.

"Once that is done, the police have to be authorized personally by giving us a letter saying that we're authorized to enforce a trespass to property act," McKay said.

"He was at the point where he had been notified in writing not to be on the property, and we had been authorized to exercise the trespass to property act," McKay said.

"If the trespassing continues, we can arrest them under the trespass to property act and hold them before a justice of the peace."

McKay said there is no set number of times a person has to trespass before he can be arrested.

"It comes down to discretion and what is happening in that particular case."

In the latest confrontation on April 26, the man returned to the Eitz Chaim campus. The police were called, and after assessing the situation, officers on the scene decided that "there were some mental health issues, and he has since been taken to the hospital," McKay said.

"It wasn't a concerning issue with the children or anything, I think he's more of a conspiracy-theory type. I think... he's not happy with the rabbis and the administration at the school."

> Israeli man to be evaluated for 'mental health issues'

Rabbi Pliner agreed, suspecting that the man "seems to be a person who has a problem with Eitz Chaim."

The rabbi said the school hired a security guard last week for an indeterminate amount of time, but said if the need for security remains, parents will be asked to cover the cost.

Alison Finkelstein, a parent of a student who attends Eitz Chaim, said she's comforted by the actions being taken by the school's staff and police.

"As a parent, I feel the school is doing everything they can to keep this person away from our kids, and keeping our kids safe," she said.

"It makes me nervous, though, that despite police involvement, this guy keeps coming back to the school. Hopefully now with security guards being hired, he will get the hint and stay away."

Late last year, Eitz Chaim was involved in a similar situation involving a different man whom Rabbi Pliner described to The CJN at the time as dressing in "a frum manner."

In that incident, the rabbi warned parents via e-mail that "a man who was raised in the Toronto Torah community... has recently tried to lure teenagers from our neighbourhoods and our schools into inappropriate relationships and situations."

OAS changes could harm older workers: prof

Government move also 'puts monetary pressure on employers'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Increasing the eligibility age for Canada's Old Age Security Pension (OAS) to 67 could harm older workers, says a Nipissing University sociology professor.

"Forcing older workers to remain in the workforce longer may serve to heighten the discrimination they already face," Ellie Berger, 38, said in a recent interview.

Berger, currently on a year-long sabbatical from the North Bay university, added that the change is good in that it gives people the choice to work longer, "but it puts monetary pressure on employers. They will have to pay benefits for two more years."

Ellie Berger

The change will be hardest for low-income Canadians or those in poor health who anticipated retiring and receiving benefits at age 65, she said.

Berger recently co-wrote a brief published by the Population Change and Lifecourse Strategic Knowledge Cluster, which found that when it comes to age discrimination and paid work, there are many areas that require improvement.

Ageism exists, the brief states, in employer attitudes, which is evident when older workers are unemployed and seeking work – "when they're on the outside trying to get in."

Berger, who is currently writing a book about ageism in the workplace, said older women looking for work are particularly discriminated against.

"After age 45, they begin to feel discrimination, and if the job is physically demanding, the age discrimination is felt earlier."

In her interviews for the book, she's spoken to employers who had positive things to say about older workers, "but discrimination comes out in day-to-day [hiring] practices," she said.

"They'll say they want a younger person behind a counter, or claim that the organization's culture is more junior. [Such ageism] is illegal, but it's difficult to prove."

In reality, Berger said, research shows that older workers are more loyal than their younger counterparts. They're also more positive, have more knowledge and learn new skills just as quickly.

Employers need to be educated about ageist attitudes and practices, particularly as they relate to the hiring, training and retention of older workers, she said.

Berger was a judge on a recent panel that awarded four companies across Canada a "Best Employers Award for 50-plus Canadians." The judging took place during the seventh annual Summit on the Mature Workplace.

The winners were AltaGas, Seven Oaks General Hospital in Winnipeg, Walmart Canada and Bethany Care Society, one of western Canada's largest not-for-profit providers of health, housing and support for seniors and people with disabilities.

"In our judging, we looked at organizational practices that encourage the hiring and retention of older workers. Too few companies have ageist-free policies."

These policies include a mentoring program in which older and younger workers are paired up, she said.

Berger, who took a gerontology course while an undergraduate at McMaster University, said her interest in the subject came from her close relationship with her grandparents. "That bond pulled me in this direction."

Cause for concern

Last week, on the eve of Yom Ha'atzmaut, when discussing Israel's key security challenges, IDF Chief of Staff Benny Gantz mentioned the political instability in Egypt and Syria as being as currently worrisome for the Jewish state as the uncertainty surrounding Iran's nuclear program.

Gantz's concerns regarding Egypt were brought into sharp, infuriating focus three days earlier by the decision of Egypt's national gas company, EGAS, to unilaterally cancel its agreement to deliver natural gas to Israel.

The unjustified, vindictive behaviour by the gas company was shameful. But worse than that, it was illegal, a clear violation of the terms of the Egypt-Israel peace treaty of 1979, from which the gas delivery agreement stemmed. The peace treaty had obligated Egypt to supply Israel with oil. But this obligation was subsequently changed to the supply of natural gas.

The government of Israel rushed to recharacterize the Egyptian move as a business, rather than political, decision.

"We don't see this cutoff of the gas as something that is born out of political developments. It's actually a business dispute between the Israeli company and the Egyptian company," the prime minister's office said the day following EGAS' announcement. Indeed, EGAS used similar "business" terminology to describe the cancellation.

But no one was fooled.

The abrogation of the agreement was about politics and nothing else.

Israel had long ago stopped relying on its Egyptian supplier. Gas had long ago stopped flowing to Israel from Egypt. Since the ouster of former president Hosni Mubarak, the pipeline in the Sinai that supplied the gas to Israel has been attacked 14 times. No arrests have ever been made in any of the attacks. In deigning to seek compensation from EGAS for the massive unbudgeted expense of finding alternate gas supplies, the Israel Electric Company upset its erstwhile Egyptian supplier.

Moreover, the frequency of the sabotage of the pipeline and the clear immunity from punishment of the saboteurs point to the lawlessness and anarchy that have taken root in the Sinai. One senses too, alas, that anarchy and lawlessness are encroaching into the very heart of Egypt itself.

The early idealists of Tahrir Square have been cast aside. Their idealism has been betrayed. Their hopes for a liberal democratic society have been trampled to dust under the marching triumphalism of the opportunistic Islamists. The unilateral cancellation of the gas delivery contract is of a piece in Egypt with the rise of the Muslim Brotherhood and the frenzied, mob attack some months ago on Israel's embassy.

Egyptian presidential elections are imminent. The political situation is fluid. And the tide of concern rises in Israel.

In an event before 75,000 people in Cologne, West Germany, Pope John Paul II beatified Edith Stein, a Jewish-born nun who was gassed at Auschwitz, and praised her for sacrificing her life for her Jewish brethren. Jewish groups criticized the move, saying Stein, a convert, died because of her Jewish heritage, not her Catholic faith. The SS seized her from her Carmelite convent in Holland in 1942.

A future without survivors

The horror of those who suffered through the Shoah can best be described by those who lived through it. The Holocaust has been chronicled in various media, including movies and plays that try to simulate reality, but it is actually seeing and hearing the survivors' tales that makes the largest impact on the listener. The article "Contemplating a future without survivors" (April 19) concludes that the best way to honour those who will no longer be able to share their eyewitness account, would be by "introducing a new ritual establishing an interactive and educational seder to be observed on Yom Hashoah."

In Toronto, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue initiated just such an event starting in 2003 called Megillat Hashoah – the Scroll of the Holocaust – a liturgical Megillah that is meant to be a unifying structure for the holiday and enable Jewish communities to observe Yom Hashoah in a more spiritual way. Alex Eisen, a Holocaust survivor and member of Beth David, pioneered the Megillat Hashoah, along with Rabbi Philip Scheim, and both men should be commended for their efforts to keep the memories alive.

Anti-Israel activists at Ben-Gurion (1)

Kudos to the Israeli governmental office that wrote the succinct and beautifully worded letter to those who descended on Israel to protest Israeli government policies in its conflict with the Palestinians ("Anti-Israel activists land at Ben-Gurion," April 19). I have waited a long time for Israel to not only speak up for itself, but also to snub its nose at those who blindly condemn just about everything Israel does and yet support heinous crimes of terrorism. So glad to see they sent back some of it. Hope to see more of it!

Anti-Israel activists at Ben-Gurion (2)

I am more than a little dismayed that you would label the letter handed to the anti-Israel activists as "sarcastic" ("Anti-Israel activists land at Ben-Gurion," April 19). Perhaps a better adjective would be "informative."

LET THEM GO...

I think instead of sending the activists back to their countries of origin, the better idea would have been to let them in, transport them to southern Israel, and have them dodge the rockets fired by Hamas in Gaza. Maybe then they would have a greater appreciation of Israel. I wonder who financed their trip and what their itinerary was? They wouldn't go to Syria, Iran or even Gaza, as they might be killed or jailed. Israel, the only true democracy in the Middle East, was safe.

Anti-Israel activists at Ben-Gurion (3)

I refer to the article "Anti-Israel activists land at Ben-Gurion" (April 19), and the Israeli government response as defined by its letter to the activists. First, it does not behoove any government to use sarcasm, for as Oscar Wilde noted, sarcasm is the lowest form of wit. To say that because Israel is a democracy it should be exempt from criticism is ridiculous. If Israel was really secure in its policies and its democracy, the actions of 43 activists would not count for much. No one questions the brutality of the current regimes in Syria and Iran or suggests they are democratic, but that does not and should not excuse Israel from scrutiny in respect to its own policies.

Looking for Krakow visitors

This year, Krakow, Poland, hosts its 22nd annual Yiddish Festival, starting on June 29 with a cantorial concert and ending on July 8 with a klezmer concert in the Jewish Kazimierz section of the city. My wife and I will be arriving in Warsaw on June 25 for a two- to three-day stay, then will visit the Lublin area and then head to Krakow for the festival. We are looking to meet fellow Canadians who will be there as well, to perhaps co-ordinate tours in the region to other Jewish places of interest. We have been to Poland twice before and have visited almost every major Polish city and more than 50 shtetls. I can be contacted via e-mail at info@judaicasales.com or by telephone at 450-687-0632.

Presidential vote raises concerns for French Jews

Richard Prasquier
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The challenge is daunting for Nicolas Sarkozy. The second round of the French presidential elections on May 6 will be decided by the transfer of votes. Will Nicolas Sarkozy be able to attract to his candidacy the vast majority of the voters of both the Centre Party and the National Front, who have different views on about everything except a common dislike for his personal style of government?

For the French Jewish community, appalled by the recent murders in the Jewish school in Toulouse, one of the key issues is how willing each candidate is to fight the new antisemitism that has developed under the mask of anti-Zionism.

There is no question that both contenders strongly reject any manifestation of antisemitism. Sarkozy has developed strong links with the French Jewish community. He has a deep knowledge of Israel and a deep sympathy for this country, which he uses sometimes for chiding the Israeli government. France has become the major supporter of Israel in advocating a firm stance against Iran.

Socialist François Hollande's feelings toward Israel have always been clearly friendly, although they have not been highlighted so much, and his stance towards the Iranian threat remains to be tested. The two candidates share similar views regarding the major issues related to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The question arises: how will the need to think about future political coalition-building, future governing circles, affect the two men's positions, and how will the results of the first round change the outlook?

In the rather unlikely case of the re-election of the incumbent president, there's no reason to think that he might change his policies. He might become more skeptical about the Arab Spring, and less optimistic about the ongoing process of radicalization in the Muslim world and its dangers for French society.

As for the high number of votes obtained by Marine Le Pen, representing the far-right National Front, founded by her father, who held antisemitic views, they're not expected to exert any influence on policies toward Jews in France. The Muslim community and immigration issues were at the forefront of their campaign.

Indeed, Marine Le Pen even tried to attract Jewish voters, as if the past of the National Front and/or the view of some of its still-influential leaders had not been known. The National Front has old scores to settle with Sarkozy's party, and there's no possibility of a political agreement between them. It's clear however that, whatever the results of the election, the important issue of secularity will lead to difficulties in the legal adjustments to religious practices such as shchitah.

The main question that arises for the Jewish community, if Hollande becomes president of France, is the influence that might be exerted by those socialist leaders who have negative views toward Israel's policies. Beyond the socialists, but still in Hollande's camp, are the leftist parties and the Greens, who express a deep hostility toward Israel and are at the forefront of every anti-Israel demonstration, declaration and petition.

The fact that Jean Luc Melenchon, the charismatic leader of the renewed Communist party, only managed a disappointing 11 per cent result, might well reduce its impact on French foreign policy, but I expect a surge in leftist and Communist manifestations of anti-Zionism.

Regardless of its political leanings, the French Jewish community, which is very close to Israel, will need to face these new challenges.

Right's rise in Europe spells darker times

Denis MacShane
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

After 1945, it was the Communist Party of France that denounced internationalism and the European Union, and was openly protectionist and often racist. Now Marine Le Pen has shown that the politics of anti-modernity cloaked in nationalist populism continue to resonate.

Some perspective is needed.

Her father, the more overtly antisemitic Jean Marie Le Pen, got close to his daughter's percentage of the vote 10 years ago. In the intervening decade, three developments have kept the far right alive.

First, the wealth gap in France has widened so that the white working class, without qualifications or well-paid jobs, feels more and more bitter, and more ignored by elite politicians.

Second, the European Union has lost its hold as a necessary project for France.

Third, the volume and visibility of immigrants from Muslim and black Africa has increased sharply.

For the elites of France of both right and left, Europe is seen as a good thing, and cheap immigrant labour provides the cleaners, nannies and unseen workers who hold down prices.

Marine Le Pen has sought to detoxify her party by rejecting the more vulgar antisemitism of her papa. But that is on a par with the right elsewhere in Europe, where Holocaust denial has been replaced by Holocaust devaluation – the argument that what Hitler did was bad, but no worse than Stalin's crimes, and that Auschwitz, like the Armenian massacres, was just another of Europe's many genocides.

It was no accident that the fanatically anti-European Daily Mail in London said the French should vote for Madame Le Pen. She wants France to quit the euro and return to a French franc, with its devaluations and erratic yo-yoing on currency markets. She wants protection for French goods.

Her advisers said she was being too economic and insufficiently anti-Islam. She made a campaign video saying that ritually slaughtered meat products were responsible for killing babies. The senior French political journalist Claude Askolovitch noted that this allegation was a throwback to the Middle Ages accusation that Jews poisoned wells to kill Christians. So although she claims to have laid to rest the anti-Jewish obsession of her father, some of the old Adam is there. She will now aim to win a block of seats in the National Assembly election and become the "official opposition."

The desire to just say "No" – to foreigners, to any external source of authority, to social solidarity – now dominates western politics from the Tea Party in America to the Swiss People's Party, with its referendum on minarets, as if religious architecture was the most central 21st-century political issue.

Like Gert Wilders, who recently brought down the conservative-liberal Dutch government, or Britain's anti-EU UKIP party, which has overtaken the coalition-member Liberal Democrats in the polls, France now has a major party that rejects much of the recent political, economic and multicultural late-20th-century settlement. It and its sister parties in Europe will not win power, but they will change European politics in the direction of darker themes and times.

This year, let's truly celebrate Israel

On Erev Yom Ha'atzmaut, I addressed hundreds of Canadian students who attended the March of the Living program. They had come from Poland, marched to the concentration camps during Holocaust Remembrance Day and were now in Israel, at a huge Canadian-Israeli celebration marking that difficult transition from Israel's Memorial Day to its Independence Day.

What could I tell them that they didn't already know? Did I need to tell them how lucky they are to be living as Canadians in 2012 and not as European Jews in the 1940s? Did I need to tell them that, as Liberal MP Irwin Cotler's parents told him, there are some things in Jewish history that are unimaginable but not unendurable, because they actually happened to us? Did I need to tell them that Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel is correct – following such evil, all we really can do is be silent, yet we must never be silenced, because we can never forget what was done to us, to our people and to humanity?

I decided to start with a personal message – and a challenge. I said that while I had heard about the trip's great success, I was skeptical. Was the trip a success? Like most operations, it takes time to see lasting impact.

The trip's success would not be determined by the experiences or emotions or friendships of the moment. The success would emerge next month, next semester and next year. Was this just another trip, just another photo album, just another series of moments to post on your Facebook page? Or was this experience life-changing? Did it make anyone more moral, more concerned with their own personal behaviour? Did it make anyone more community-oriented, more committed to making their own slice of the world better, more just or more caring? Did it make anyone more committed to Judaism, the Jewish People, Canadian values or humanity?

Gil Troy

in Montreal

None of these questions could be answered glibly, immediately. The answer has to be etched out, moment by moment, mitzvah by mitzvah, value by value. The answer would come gradually over the short term and the long term, by the kinds of people they choose to be, the kinds of deeds they choose to do, the kinds of ideas they choose to champion and the kinds of morals they choose to uphold.

Meanwhile, I said, as those thoughts and values percolate – let's celebrate. Let's celebrate a free, proud Israel. And let's celebrate Israel with all five senses.

Let's rejoice in the sounds of Israel, from the medley of happy, healthy kids shouting as they play in Jerusalem's playgrounds – which include the Old City's ancient alleyways – to the awestruck quiet on Yom Kippur, when through custom not compulsion, few Israelis drive.

Let's delight in the smells of Israel, with the Galilee and Negev in full bloom after a winter of real rain, and that drooping purple plant, the wisteria, entrancing with its sweet fragrance as we wander Jerusalem's streets.

Let's celebrate the sights of Israel, particularly the juxtaposition of old and new that I witnessed as I ran the Jerusalem half-marathon this year with thousands of others, starting with the symbols of modern Israeli statesmanship – the Knesset, the Supreme Court, the Foreign Ministry – and then cutting through the Old City on the way up to the new neighbourhoods of Arnona – and back!

Let's appreciate the tastes of Israel, particularly the flavours I savour just by waltzing down Jerusalem's Emek Refaim – from Joy's modern fusion to Kaffit's creative choices to Marvad Haksamim's Sephardi delicacies to Buffalo Steak House's entrecote to Sushi Rehavia's Sushi, and to my new discovery, thanks to my daughter, the eclectic 54HaMoshava. And all are kosher!

And let's toast the soft touch of Israel – it feels right to be a part of the Hebrew revolution, in which pigs-in-blankets (mini hotdogs in buns) become Moshe be-teva, Moses in a basket. It feels good to be in a place committed to building an idealistic Zionist "us," not just indulging the never-satisfied "me." It feels grand to contribute to an experiment in nurturing a liberal democracy with a Jewish sensibility, a modern country proud of its ancient past, a start-up nation that's also a values nation.

And in that celebration of this extraordinary country, we can also celebrate our own rebirths, our own commitment to take our new experiences and stretch, becoming the best people we can be.

Do we really love Ruth?

"She's a convert, you know, but so active in the shul – even more than her Jewish husband!" The words were whispered conspiratorially to me at a bar mitzvah luncheon, as if this information was crucial for me to know. The woman in question had converted more than 25 years ago, had raised two Jewish kids, chants Torah and continually takes Jewish adult education.

"Actually, she's a Jew," I whisper back.

It's true, and I'm not afraid to say it: converts make the best Jews. It doesn't come naturally to them in the beginning. They work hard at it and want to perfect it. If they're going to radically change their lives, they believe they ought to do it with purpose and intention. And once they pass the beit din, they don't feel they're finished, like a 13-year-old at his bar mitzvah – "Phew! That's over!"

I'll never forget the mother-in-law who told her newly Jewish daughter-in-law at the conversion mikvah, "Good! Now that you are officially Jewish you can stop practising, like the rest of us." What a welcome. What does that say about how much we born Jews appreciate our own heritage?

I spent an interesting and challenging week at a special conference for Latin American Jews this past winter. Gathered there were representatives of Jewish congregations throughout South and Central America. The synagogues shared many common interests and difficulties: small size, isolation, finding Spanish resources and Spanish-speaking rabbis, ignorance, antisemitism and anti-Zionism in their respective countries.

But what they also shared was more surprising: having to deal with an influx of Latinos who want to convert. Indigenous Guatemalans such as my congregation who grew disillusioned with both the Catholic Church of their youth and the new coercive passion of the evangelicals. Native tribesmen from the hills of Ecuador who claim they are one of the 10 lost Hebrew tribes. Those who trace their ancestry to the Mayans, but are drawn to Judaism. And those who believe they're descendants of anusim, Jews forced out of Judaism during the terrible era of the Inquisition.

Often brown-skinned, often working class, these folks represent a new kind of convert who challenges all stereotypes: not white, not having grown up in a Jewish neighbourhood, not familiar with Yiddishisms from TV, not "marrying in," and often coming in complete family groups.

They will surely change the public face of the small, mostly white, upper class, nominally Orthodox Jewish communities in these parts. Some people welcome that change and have no fear of "dilution." But some people have trepidation that their hard-earned peace and hard-won recognition will somehow be challenged by welcoming these new "others," that somehow changing the public face of Judaism will existentially threaten Judaism, too. They're not like us. It's true. Are we the only "us" to be defined as Jewish?

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

I've heard people say that although someone converts, they will never really, truly "be" Jewish. They don't really feel it in their kishkes the way "we" do. In the vast majority of cases, this is utterly false. In the vast majority of cases, it's the passion, interest, skill, knowledge and commitment of the Jew-by-choice that threatens us to the core. It threatens our complacency. It threatens our jaded boredom with our own heritage. It threatens our smug sense of "I am a good Jew even though I don't do a Jewish thing, ever." It threatens our security when our kids cease being interested in anything Jewish. It threatens our romanticized picture of who we are as Jews.

On the one hand, we seem to love the "exotic" nature of Chinese Jews, black Jews, and people from various indigenous tribes around the world who practise eighth-day circumcision and don't eat pork so they must somehow be Jewish. Do you mean that Asian beauty or that Irish boxer you married is also Jewish? How lucky can you get? But on the other hand, we're downright scared of their taking us – our books, our holidays, our fragile Jewish existence – on.

At the end of this month, we'll celebrate Shavuot, and we'll read the Book of Ruth. We boast that this story is about welcoming the stranger, about the pure intent of the Jew-by-choice, about the love for Judaism a convert has. We tease our converted daughters-in-law that they are like Ruth – better Jews than us.

But do we really love Ruth?

Terror out of Egypt's Sinai hits Israel

Remote and spectacularly scenic, with rugged mountains, rolling desert vistas, enchanting oases and inviting sandy beaches, the Sinai Peninsula is a dream destination. Inhabited by Bedouin tribes whose respect for borders is at best minimal, it was little more than a strategic buffer after the 1956 Arab-Israeli war. But, with its capture by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War, the Sinai soon found a place in the sun as a tourist mecca.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel developed it in methodical fashion, prompting a torrent of Israelis to take advantage of its beauty. They continued to pour into the Sinai even after Israel gave it up after signing a peace treaty with Egypt in 1979.

But in the past eight years, and particularly since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in 2005 and Hosni Mubarak's ouster as president in 2011, the Sinai has morphed into a "terror zone," according to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

With the erosion of Egyptian sovereignty there and the resultant power vacuum, the Sinai has degenerated into a haven for terrorists and common criminals – who have used it as a platform to attack tourists and infrastructure – and a virtual no-go zone for tourists.

Recently, Israel's Counterterrorism Bureau urged Israeli travellers to leave the Sinai immediately, citing plots by terrorist organizations to wreak mayhem and bloodshed. While the head of Israeli military intelligence, Gen. Aviv Kochavi, disclosed that Israel has foiled more than 11 plots in the Sinai in the past two months and that terrorists are "strengthening their hold" there.

Kochavi delivered his analysis shortly after rockets launched from the Sinai hit Eilat, landing harmlessly near a residential neighbourhood.

Channel 10, an Israeli television station, claimed they had been smuggled out of post-Gadhafi Libya and were fired by the Gaza-based Popular Resistance Committees, a Palestinian group that participated in the kidnapping of Gilad Schalit in 2006.

Lamentably, the targeting of Eilat was a case of déjà vu. Two years ago, rockets hit Eilat and the adjacent Jordanian town of Aqaba, killing one person and wounding four.

The most recent incident in Eilat was the gravest one of its kind in southern Israel since Aug. 18, 2011, when gunmen from Sinai staged brazen cross-border attacks in which eight Israelis were slain and 31 were injured. In hot pursuit, Israel killed some of the attackers, but in the crossfire five Egyptian policemen were fatally shot.

The battle elicited a sharp response from Egypt and triggered mob violence in Cairo that resulted in the sacking of Israel's embassy, an unprecedented and worrisome development in Israel's pivotal bilateral relationship with Egypt, the first Arab country to sign a peace treaty with the Jewish state.

The treaty ushered in a period of calm and stability along Israel's 240-kilometre frontier with Egypt, but in the Sinai, the tranquility was violently and ominously broken.

On Oct. 5, 1965, an Egyptian soldier, Sulayman Khatir, machine-gunned a party of vacationers in Ras Burqa, a Red Sea beach resort, killing seven Israelis, including four children. Khatir, deemed mentally ill, was sentenced to life imprisonment at hard labour. Ten days after the verdict was handed down, he was found dead in his cell.

On Oct. 7, 2004, Palestinian terrorists drove a bomb-laden truck into the lobby of the Hilton Hotel in Taba, just south of Eilat, killing 31 guests, including 12 from Israel, and wounding 159 others. On the same day, a car bomb killed two Israelis at Ras al-Shitan, near Nuweiba.

On July 23, 2005, the Abdullah Azzam Brigades, an organization supposedly linked to Al Qaeda, killed 88 people and wounded more than 200, the majority of them Egyptians, in Sharm el-Sheikh, Egyptian authorities erected a barrier around the town, cutting it off from Bedouin encampments.

On April 24, 2006, three bomb explosions in Dahab killed 23 tourists and wounded 80, mostly Egyptian nationals. Egyptian security officials claimed the bombings were the work of a radical Islamic outfit, Jamat al-Tawhid.

Since Israel's pullout from Gaza and its imposition of a naval blockade around Gaza, the Sinai has become something of a no-man's land, notwithstanding efforts by Egypt to secure it.

Weapons and munitions are smuggled into Gaza via a maze of tunnels in the Sinai. During the 2008-09 war in Gaza, Israeli aircraft bombed the tunnels, but with the end of hostilities, smuggling operations resumed with a vengeance.

This is not Israel's only problem.

The multimillion-dollar pipeline in the Sinai that supplies Israel with about 40 per cent of its natural gas has been bombed no less than 14 times since the signing of a commercial agreement between Israel and Egypt in 2005.

Ten days ago, a month and a half after the Islamist-dominated Egyptian parliament voted to stop the export of gas to Israel, the Egyptian state-owned company that ships it to Israel announced that further supplies would no longer be sent to Israel due to an unresolved commercial dispute with its Israeli partner.

But the following day, an Egyptian cabinet minister said that Israel could negotiate a new contract at a higher price, suggesting that the cutoff, a disquieting moment in Israeli-Egyptian relations, was a shameless gambit on Egypt's part.

The lawlessness that has descended on the Sinai has forced the Israeli government to bolster security in a region of Israel that has generally been quiet.

The road that runs parallel to Egypt's frontier has been moved eastward by 750 metres. Israel has significantly built up its forces along the Egyptian border and is co-operating with Egypt to keep terrorists out of the Sinai. Since 2008, in contravention of the peace treaty, Israel has permitted Egypt to deploy thousands of troops in the Sinai.

Work on a $350-million barrier from Eilat to Gaza, originally designed to keep out African refugees, has been accelerated and will be ready soon.

In a sense, however, Israel's hands are tied. Given the political uncertainties in post-Mubarak Egypt, Israel may have no alternative but to exercise restraint in response to future terrorist attacks emanating from the Sinai, fearing that retaliatory strikes may jeopardize the peace treaty, a cornerstone of its security.

Yehudit Dasberg spoke for Israel's terror victims. Her daughter, Effie, and son-in-law, Yaron, were shot and killed by Hamas terrorists in 1996 while driving home from a wedding, leaving Dasberg and her husband to raise their two infant sons.

"I understood that from this moment on, I was responsible for the happiness of these two babies, and that they would not suffer from the loss of their parents. Before I even started to grieve for the loss of my daughter, I right away got a new task… and this saved my life," Dasberg said.

Effie's death was also a loss in other ways, her mother said. Dasberg was wearing a necklace designed by her daughter, a graphic artist who was starting to get recognition for her work and whose illustrations were published posthumously in a series of popular Israeli children's books.

From loss to independence

Rabbi Korobkin led the ceremony's transition into a celebration of Israel's independence.

Then in a video, Joseph Warner explained how he volunteered to travel to Israel in 1948 and join the Machal brigade, an acronym for Mitnadvei Chutz La'aretz, overseas volunteers who fought with the Israeli forces in the War of Independence, hoping to use his Canadian navy experience in Israel.

Warner was in the audience and saluted the brigade by raising the Israeli flag.

As the evening shifted from sombre remembrance to celebration of Israel's accomplishments, Mizrachi Canada honoured the outgoing consul general of Israel in Toronto, Amir Gissin, who will move back to Israel this summer after five years in Canada.

"My goal was to create among all Jews of Toronto a pride for the State of Israel, for this combination between grief and sorrow, and at the same time, tremendous strength, resilience and pride. Having a country of our own is costly… but we are strong, and we understand our reality, and we are proud of what we achieved in the State of Israel," Gissin said.

Because of CHW supporters, like you, Ben and his family receive 'a bit more' to ensure that they flourish.

Ben, an affectionate toddler attends a CHW Daycare Centre in Israel. Recently, it was discovered that Ben suffers from a degenerative eye disease, which will lead to his eventual blindness. Because of this, Ben receives one-on-one assistance so that he can participate in activities with the other children; he also receives guidance to help him with his disability. As Ben's family suffers financially, the daycare staff sends home leftover food, bread and vegetables; also advocating for the family when needed.

Because of CHW supporters, like you, Rachel received same-day testing, faster treatment and care.

Rachel, a 40-year-old, who recently arrived to Israel from Ethiopia, came to the CHW M. Fanny Breast Care Institute at Assaf Harofeh Medical Center after discovering a skin lesion on her breast. Biopsy results revealed that Rachel had Paget's Disease, a malignant condition. Further imaging found ductal carcinoma. In this instance, the only course was a mastectomy. Rachel was informed of her condition, and after consultation with her family and doctors, she decided to proceed with surgery, and breast reconstruction. Rachel is recovering well and is hopeful for an improved life with her family.

Because of CHW supporters, like you, Maya receives counselling, ensuring that she and her child thrive.

Maya, mother of 3-year-old Ora, noticed that her daughter was becoming increasingly aggressive, physically acting out, and talking back. Worried, Maya turned to the director at Ora's daycare centre, who suggested the WIZO Parental Hotline. Maya called and as she spoke with a volunteer, Idit, it was discovered that Maya's recent job loss and other stresses were affecting Ora. Idit suggested parenting techniques, such as setting boundaries and encouraged Maya to call back in a few weeks to discuss their progress, which she did.

Yom Hazikaron ceremony draws record crowd

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Yom Hazikaron ceremony at Toronto's Beth Tzedec synagogue last week had the largest attendance of any commemorative event of its kind outside of Israel.

Nearly 5,000 members of Toronto's Jewish community packed the shul's main auditorium for a sombre, emotive service in memory of the 22,993 men and women who have died defending the Jewish state, and the 2,457 victims of terrorism who have perished since 1948.

With a solitary yizkor candle burning in front of the bimah, a lone trumpeter sounded a dirge as the Israeli flag was lowered to half-mast.

The evening highlighted the daily struggle Israeli parents and families experience, balancing the fear of losing a loved one and the pride felt in knowing they are serving to protect their country.

"Without the IDF [Israel Defence Forces], there would be no Israel," Sarner said at the start of the evening.

Organized by the Israeli Consulate in Toronto, the event featured poems recited by bereaved families of fallen soldiers; a video of a father and son, Maj. Maoz Poraz and Capt. Nir Poraz respectively, who both lost their lives in IDF service separated by a generation; a children's choir from the Kachol Lavan school; and performances by three of the city's major chazzanim, Beth Tzedec Congregation's Simon Spiro, Holy Blossom Temple's Benjamin Maissner, and Marshall Loomer of the Beth David synagogue.

Throughout the hour-long ceremony, sniffling, crying and quiet groans of anguish could be heard from various points in the hall, as loved ones were remembered and missed.

In an address to the audience, Ami Gissin, Israel's outgoing consul genera to Toronto and Western Canada, thanke the members of the local Israeli commu nity for coming and encouraging thei non-Israeli Jewish friends to participate i the ceremony.

Outside the synagogue's main hall displays about victims of terror and fall en soldiers were set up and volunteer handed out "yizkor" lapel stickers to thos walking into the synagogue.

According to Gissin, the event was success in that it helped gather more non Israelis than ever before to experience Yom Hazikaron, and hopefully helped them develop more of a cultural connection with the Israeli community.

The ceremony concluded with a reading of a prayer for the well-being of Israe by former Conservative MP Stockwell Day, followed by the Israeli national anthem sung by Toronto jazz singer Sophie Milman.

Students interview survivors, war veterans

Oral History Project held at Crestwood

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

Crestwood Preparatory College held its third annual Oral History Project Breakfast last week.

The school's cafeteria was abuzz with students, their grandparents and members of the community enjoying waffles, eggs and live music performed by the school's students and staff.

For Scott Masters, the head of Crestwood's social studies department, this yearly breakfast is one of the most important events of the school year. Masters organized the get-together as a way to thank and to keep in touch with the many Holocaust survivors and World War II veterans who participate in his students' Oral History Project.

For the project, which has been ongoing in some form for about the last 10 years, high school students interview family members or other community members about their experiences in the Holocaust and World War II.

In the last few years, the students have been recording the interviews, collecting photographs and video footage, and creating multimedia DVDs for each veteran or survivor they speak to.

"I had the idea about five years ago to take the video-taping approach," said Masters, who has archived the video interviews, now totalling about 200, on the school's website. He explained that recording his students' interviews is the best way to preserve the important memories, especially as survivors and veterans continue to age.

Masters, who greeted many guests at the breakfast by name, said that over the years he has gotten to know a lot of the interviewees as they return regularly to talk to the students about their experiences. For the students, this opportunity to bring history class to life has been invaluable. "Some kids are really fascinated with history, and it really resonates with them," Masters said.

His words ring true as grades 11 and 12 students continue to participate in the Oral History Project voluntarily, after doing it as a mandatory part of the Grade 10 history curriculum.

Katherine Charness, a Jewish student in Grade 11, did the project for the second time this year. In Grade 10, she interviewed her grandfather, a veteran, and this year she interviewed Irene Csillag, a Holocaust survivor.

"Everyone has a different story to tell, and I think there's something unique about every story," Charness said, adding that she thinks it is important to encourage people to share their experiences and memories.

For Csillag and her daughter, Judy, who attended the breakfast for the first time this year, it was a heart-warming experience. "It's very nice that people are still remembering," said Csillag.

Masters, who won the prestigious Prime Minister's Award for Teaching Excellence last year, is happy to see this important history project thriving, as students and members of the community get together to learn about the past. "It's been a great project. It's totally rejuvenated me."

Slowly counting the Omer

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

While the holiday of Pesach is still being celebrated, we also begin to count the days of the Omer. The counting of the Omer will ultimately result in counting seven weeks until the holiday of Shavuot.

In biblical times, this period of counting was one of great anticipation and joy. The climax of the counting, Shavuot, was one of the three pilgrimage festivals and the beginning of one of the harvests. The whole nation was on the move, and the resulting marketplace and national unity celebration is probably unimaginable to us.

Today, we signify Shavuot as the celebration of the giving and the receiving of the Torah at Mount Sinai. It's a time that the Jewish nation stood together and announced with one voice that we wholeheartedly receive the Torah. The fact that we all agreed on something is cause enough for celebration, but agreeing on the Torah is truly an essential cause to celebrate.

When we look at the two holidays, Pesach and Shavuot, it's interesting that they both speak of redemption, but in very different ways. On Pesach, we were redeemed from slavery in Egypt, and at Mount Sinai we are redeemed through receiving the Torah. The first is a physical redemption, while the second is a spiritual redemption.

And yet both of these events take time and are hardly instantaneous. The process of leaving Egypt is lengthy, as evidenced by the 10 plagues. We arrive at Mount Sinai and spend at least two years hearing the laws and studying the vision for our new society.

In today's world, we are very accustomed to instant gratification. If our phone takes more than 10 seconds to turn on we become frustrated. The Internet had better load the page we're looking for quickly, or we'll click on another link. And Facebook will upload the pictures of our lives in the blink of an eye. It's no wonder we expect our redemptive moments to be quick and instant.

But we know that anything of value must take its time. Counting the weeks of the Omer allows us to value time itself. We recognize that we're leading toward something worthwhile, and we anticipate the advent of the holiday. Each day we count is a day that brings us closer. As well, counting is a countercultural act, in that it slows things down, while during the rest of our day, we use technology to speed things up.

The Torah represents our spiritual redemption. A beautiful midrash in the Jerusalem Talmud emphasizes these lessons when two sages are walking at daybreak. They see the light of dawn through the darkness, and one Sage remarks, "My friend, behold how the dawn grows stronger and stronger. So shall our Redemption be: at first, a little, then more and more."

Migration in the Mediterranean

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

The Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto, along with the Institute for Hellenistic Studies at the University of Waterloo and the Royal Ontario Museum, is planning a major international conference on the topic of Migration in the Mediterranean: from Alexander the Great to Suleiman the Magnificent.

For much of recorded history, the Mediterranean has been one large highway that facilitated the movement of peoples, goods and ideas. It is an activity in which we Jews have been important participants.

Migration has played a major role in our history. One could say that our ancestor Abraham began this history when he migrated from Ur of the Chaldees to the land of Canaan on the shores of the eastern Mediterranean. Abraham also briefly sojourned in Egypt, a place that would figure prominently in our story for thousands of years.

Abraham's grandson, Jacob, and Jacob's son, Joseph, were responsible for a migration to Egypt that would last for hundreds of years and lead to the defining event in our early history – the Exodus and the theophany at Sinai

Historically and archeologically, scholars at one time linked us and our initial stay in Egypt with a group called the Hyksos, who took over the country from about 1700 to 1500 BCE. These people came from Canaan and spoke a language related to Hebrew. However, for about the last few decades, most scholars no longer accept this theory.

More often than not, our migrations were forced upon us. Such was the case in 722 BCE when we experienced the trauma of the destruction of the kingdom of Israel by the mighty Assyrian Empire and the expulsion of its people that led to the legend of the Ten Lost Tribes. A hundred and twenty-five years later, the same fate would befall the southern kingdom of Judah when the Babylonians destroyed the First Temple, put Jerusalem to the torch and exiled its people "by the waters of Babylon."

Archeology has borne vivid testimony to this destruction. It was something that I saw first-hand in the late 1970s and early 1980s when I was involved in the excavations of the City of David led by Yigal Shiloh of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Institute of Archaeology.

By the middle part of the first millennium BCE, migrations had become common in the Mediterranean. Between the eighth and sixth centuries BCE, the Greeks led a mass migration around the Mediterranean when they established numerous colonies along its shores, spreading their language and culture in the process. Their new cities became magnets for settlement, especially Alexandria, which was established at the mouth of the Nile River by Alexander the Great. Jews flocked to this city in large numbers, and it is estimated that at one time we made up 25 per cent of its population.

The Greeks also gave us the word "diaspora." It is a word that has defined much of our history for the last 2,500 years.

Making the mundane holy

Rabbi Ilan Emanuel

"You shall be holy, for I, the Eternal your God, am holy." These are the words that introduce Leviticus 19, one of the most powerful and uplifting chapters in the Torah. In it, we're not only commanded by God to "be holy" but, helpfully, we're provided with an exhaustive list of activities that define holiness.

What's remarkable about this list is the sheer range of human activity it encompasses. There are commandments about Shabbat and sacrifices, and against idolatry. There are commandments to leave the corners of your fields for the poor, to love the stranger, and to rise before the aged, and there are prohibitions against stealing, insulting the deaf, showing favour to either the poor or the rich, bearing a grudge, and falsifying weights.

What is particularly interesting about this list is how it sheds light on what it means to be holy in Judaism. On one hand, holiness is about separation, setting aside what is holy from what is profane and mundane. To be holy means to make an effort to separate ourselves from the everyday and usual and set time aside in our lives to focus on the spiritual. Thus we set aside Shabbat, sanctifying it to God and creating a space in our lives to be holy, away from the distractions of our daily lives.

But in Judaism, as reflected in this list, holiness is also part of how we interact with the world. It's about how we relate to others, how we conduct business, how we deal with our employees. Judaism is famously not just a religion but "a

Thus Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel argues: "Judaism is a theology of the common deed, of the trivialities of life, dealing not so much with training for the exceptional as with the management of the trivial." We're commanded to be part of the world, involved in its minutiae, finding holiness in the everyday. Thus when we help a person overcome an obstacle in their lives, we're being holy. When we give tzedakah or volunteer to help those less fortunate than ourselves, we're being holy. And when we act in ways that foster tolerance and understanding between people, we're being holy.

While these two concepts of holiness may seem radically different – separation from the world versus being part of it – they are, in many ways, two sides of the same coin.

Finding holiness in the everyday is not about making more moments mundane but about raising more of the everyday to be holy. It is about recognizing that moments we might otherwise think of as mundane and insignificant can and should be made holy and special. In every interaction we have in life, we have the opportunity not just to find holiness but to make holiness, setting aside that moment and sanctifying it. And every time we do we make ourselves and the world a little more holy.

The ketubah: a document of devotion

It's not too often that you find a legal document that can also be a stunning work of art illustrating love and commitment.

The ketubah, the Jewish marriage contract, has for thousands of years detailed a husband's obligations to his wife during marriage and his responsibilities in the case of divorce. Beyond that, the ketubah has become a prized piece of Judaica that artists have elevated to become a document of devotion.

If it's time to choose the design for your own ketubah, mazel tov on your engagement! And even if you're not getting married, you still can enjoy a tour of one of Judaism's most interesting and beautiful documents.

According to the Ohr Somayach site, "this contract is ordained by Mishnaic law (circa 170 CE, and according to some authorities dates back to biblical times. The ketubah, written in Aramaic, details the husband's obligations to his wife: food, clothing, dwelling and pleasure. It also creates a lien on all his property to pay her a sum of money and support (200 zuz and 200 silver pieces, should he divorce her, or predecease her." [http://bit.ly/ketuba1]

In the Value and Significance of the Ketubah, Rabbi Michael Broyde and Jonathan Reiss investigate whether a ketubah can be legally enforced in the United States. In short: probably not. [http://bit.ly/ketuba8]

Most ketubot in recent centuries have conformed to a standardized text but as Eliezer Segal points out, some ancient ketubot addressed the termination of the marriage at the initiative of the husband and even the wife. Here's an excerpt from the oldest existing ketubah, dating from the fifth century BCE and originating on the island of Elephantine in the Nile. "If at some time, Ananiah should stand up before the assembly and declare: 'I reject my wife, Jehoshama. She shall not be my wife!' then he is obligated to pay divorce

Jewish & Digital

money… And if Jehoshama should reject her husband, Ananiah, and declare before him, 'I reject you and will not be your wife!' then she shall be obliged to pay the 'divorce money.'" [http://bit.ly/ketuba5]

For more on the history of the ketubah, visit the entry at the Jewish Encyclopedia. [http://bit.ly/ketuba6]

The traditional ketubah is written in Aramaic, the language of the Babylonian Jews.

Many modern variations – Conservative, Reform, egalitarian, etc. – have been crafted recently. [http://bit.ly/ketuba2] For example, the Conservative ketubah includes the "Lieberman clause," which was added to allow either the man or the woman to initiate a divorce. Check with your rabbi before selecting your text. [http://bit.ly/ketuba3]

As well, another site advises, "For those couples intending to make aliyah to Israel, it is preferable to choose the Orthodox ketubah text… so there will be no problems concerning its validity before the Israeli bet din." [http://bit.ly/ketuba4]

Although the ketubah is essentially a legal document, the adornment of this document is a cherished tradition. As Yale University's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library eloquently puts it: "These decorations transform the ketubah from a dry legal document into a work of art, and a window into the world and culture of the Jewish communities that produced them." [http://bit.ly/ketuba7]

Next time, online ketubah galleries – classic and modern – and tips for creating your own.

Phil Lepofsky, an individual supported by Reena, has been chosen to receive the United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's *Shem Tov Award.

Phil has much to be proud of. He became a member of the Reena 'family' in 1981 and initially lived in a group home setting. It wasn't long before his ability to live in a supported independent setting was recognized and Phil moved into his own apartment in 1985. Phil took advantage of the support he received and his natural enthusiasm to ask questions and to learn provided a platform for him to develop his life-skills and, more important, to develop a sense of self within the community.

Phil is deeply attached to his Jewish heritage and the values that enrich his life. He is observant and rarely misses services at the Pride of Israel Synagogue. He looks forward to all of the Jewish holidays with eager anticipation and takes pride in discussing what those holidays mean to him and how he is preparing for those holidays.

Phil is very proud of his many achievements in the workplace. He was employed at Mr. Leonards for 11 years and was presented with an award for " Employee of the Year" in 1994 for his services. He worked at Allwood Products and Rainy Products for approximately one year. He is currently employed by Teknion Furniture in the mailroom where he has worked for six years.

Phil has been a member in good standing on several committees at Reena. He served as a member of the Continuous Quality Improvement Committee of the Reena Board for two terms; he has been a member on the Reena Board and recently became a member on Reena's Holocaust Education Committee. Phil says that he enjoys volunteering his time because this provides an opportunity for him to engage in discussions about what is important to him and also allows him to share his unique perspective.

Phil has a supportive family that he socializes with throughout the year and has a circle of friends that are very important to him. He enjoys stamp collecting and politics. Phil is never too shy to tell you that politics is by far his favourite hobby and enjoys political debates both Canadian and American. Phil uses every media tool available and enjoys engaging in discussions on a one to one basis while visiting his home.

"I like to volunteer because it is important to me", Phil says. "I like to think about others and not just about myself".

*The UJA Federation Shem Tov Award is presented in recognition of exemplary volunteers with at least five years of voluntary activity at a leadership level. It is one of the most prestigious acknowledgements that our community can bestow.

Conference examines threats to Israel's security

Reva Kaiser
Special to The CJN

The Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) launched its Toronto chapter last month with a locally hosted national conference about Israel's security.

CIJR is an independent Israel- and Jewish-issues-centred think-tank focused on Middle East foreign policy and international relations.

The conference, titled "Israel's Security: Failed 'Arab Spring,' Iranian Bomb, U.S. Foreign Policy," focused on Russia's meddling in the Middle East and U.S. President Barack Obama's passivity, as well as the possibility of Iranian nuclear warfare and the failed Arab Springs uprisings.

CIJR founder Prof. Frederick Krantz, a professor of history at Concordia University, spoke about the failed Arab Springs. He emphasized the political weakening and economic decline of the countries that experienced these uprisings, factors that have contributed to prolonged political instability in those regions and a resulting decrease in conflict with Israel. With such internal unrest, "these entities are not a military threat to Israel," Krantz said.

But Israel is facing a perfect storm, said Aurel Braun, a professor of international relations and political science at the University of Toronto. While he focused on Russia's involvement in the Middle East, he summarized the threats contributing to Israel's political unease – a Russian policy that is mischief, an Iranian policy that is malice and an American foreign policy that is misunderstanding.

Braun reminded the audience that Russia, while not the superpower the Soviet Union once was, has the ambition to be one, so it intervenes politically where it doesn't have the capacity to do so.

In Russia's attempt to undermine the United States and enhance it own political power, it supports Middle East states, particularly Syria, one of the largest purchasers of Russian armaments, which then frequently find their way to Iran. "Russia is not an anti-Israeli state," said Braun, "but [President Vladimir] Putin is reckless with Israel's safety."

Harold Waller, a professor of political science at McGill University, examined U.S. foreign policy on Iran. Epitomized in Obama's approach of "leading from behind," the current U.S. foreign policy does not take a leadership role, said Waller, but prefers to work with other countries – a different approach from previous administrations.

Obama is desperate to avoid a military option, Waller said, which is increasing tensions between Israel and the United States. The United States continues to delay decision-making, but Israel has a more compelling need to decide sooner, rather than later.

Once Iran has nuclear weapons, said Waller, Israel's strategic situation is profoundly altered. Without U.S. involvement, Israel will need to decide whether to act on its own, which could result in uncertain consequences, Waller said.

According to Norrin Ripsman, a professor of political science at Concordia University, Israeli intelligence believes that Iran is developing nuclear capabilities. However, he doesn't think that Israel currently has the capacity to strike preemptively. "Since a failed strike is worse than no strike at all, I can't imagine that Israeli leaders would be very sanguine about initiating such a risky strike," he said.

With Israel's insufficient capacity to strike Iran and Obama's clear disinterest in doing so, especially before the November U.S. elections, Ripsman said the ideal scenario would be for Israel to sabotage Iran's nuclear facilities through technology, as it did with the Stuxnet worm. "Israel might have to hope that it can deter a nuclear Iran," Ripsman said.

Sally Zerker, a professor of economics at York University, examined a political threat to Israel that is internal: the proliferation of Jewish anti-Zionists.

She said that anti-Zionists espouse the ideology that the State of Israel should not exist and actively promote measures that contribute to Israel's destabilization. A growing number of academics teaching at Israeli universities are Jewish anti-Zionists, she said, and because of their considerable influence on the developing political beliefs of their students, they are dangerous.

New CFHU exec urges investment in 'human resources'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Elan Divon, the newly appointed executive director of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's (CFHU) Toronto chapter, said he hopes to communicate that an investment in Hebrew U is an investment in Israel's future.

"I'm trying to mobilize people's love and passion for Israel toward investing in a place that is, in many ways, a big part of Israel's success as a country," said Divon, who follows Jenifer Lev into his new role with CFHU, a non-profit organization that raises awareness and funds for the university.

Divon comes to CFHU from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, where he served as a senior campaign consultant.

The experience he gained elevating UJA's profile and raising funds translates well to his new position.

"What I'd like to do is try to make the connection in terms of how we brand the university," Divon said.

"What separates Israel from our neighbours is certainly not our natural resources, it's our human resources. And to invest in human resources, you have to invest in universities, and there's no better way to do that than to invest in Israel's number 1 academic institution."

Elan Divon

Hebrew U, founded in 1918 by some of the greatest Jewish minds of the 20th century, ranks as one of the world's leading research universities. Eight Nobel Prizes have been awarded to Hebrew U faculty.

Although Divon is not a Hebrew U grad himself – he obtained master's degrees from Brandeis University and Harvard University – he does have a very personal connection to the institution.

"I wouldn't be sitting here today, literally, if it wasn't for Hebrew University because my parents met there. They're both alumni," he said.

"They had met before then. My dad was injured in the army – he got a bullet in his leg – and my mother was a nurse, but they lost contact and they met again at a Hebrew University discotheque about a year later."

Divon added that his grandfather also taught in the faculty of medicine at the university.

As an accomplished scholar himself, Divon said he is proud of the importance Hebrew U places on higher learning, innovation and thinking outside the box.

He hopes he'll be successful in relating that message to Jewish young professionals in Toronto.

In fact, the first major event running under Divon's leadership, featuring entrepreneur Ben Casnocha, is geared specifically to Jews between the ages of 20 and 40.

The May 16 event, titled The Start-Up of You!, will be led by Casnocha, a technology entrepreneur who founded his first startup when he was just 14 years old and has been named by Business Week as "one of America's top young entrepreneurs."

His lecture will be based on a new book he co-authored with LinkedIn founder Reid Hoffman, titled The Start-Up of You: Adapt to the Future, Invest in Yourself, and Transform Your Career.

"He's a young guy, a young entrepreneur... I think he'll talk about how to get people to think like an entrepreneur," Divon said.

"This is really catered to young professionals. We want to do more events and programs that are going to bring value to young professionals and tie into what Hebrew University is about."

Divon said he also has ambitions to foster more ties between educational institutions and other Canadian agencies, such as the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation.

"There is a lot of great research and development and innovation that is happening in Canada, and we think that if we can bring together some of the great minds that we've got here in Toronto together with the great work going on at Hebrew University, we can really take things further and do even greater things."

Anne Frank's diary reaches 70th anniversary

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

This summer marks 70 years since Anne Frank received a red-checkered notebook for her 13th birthday.

On April 22, experts spoke at York University about the diary that has become the most widely read piece of Holocaust literature in the world.

Professors Jeffrey Shandler and Edna Nahshon discussed the history and legacy of Anne Frank's journal as a cultural artifact in a lecture series sponsored by York's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies.

Originally a collection of notebooks and loose pages, The Diary of a Young Girl has been printed in more than 60 languages and sold more than 31 million copies worldwide.

Shandler, a professor of Jewish studies at Rutgers University, described the evolving forms of the diary from its first printing in 1947 to its place in today's world.

"By publishing, reading, and using the diary to produce new works, many people believe they are honouring Anne's wish to go on living even after death," he said.

Shandler discussed the multiple ways people have tried to understand and connect with Frank, from the creation of the Anne Frank Museum in Amsterdam to the Anne Frank chestnut trees planted at Ground Zero.

Following Shandler's presentation, Nahshon, a professor of Hebrew at the Jewish Theological Seminary, shed light on the popular Broadway adaptation of Frank's story. The Diary of Anne Frank made its debut in 1955 after years of work and debate.

"The idea of a stage adaptation was initially considered inappropriate," Nahshon said, noting that Otto Frank, Anne's father, who'd survived the war, initially could not picture it when he was approached about the idea.

Nahshon said it was incredibly rare for diaries to be successfully adapted into plays, because of their lack of linear plot, their focus on the author's inner qualities, and their fragmentary, everyday nature.

"I think [the diary] succeeded because of the audience's awareness of the ending – the tension, irony of knowing what the characters did not. As [New York Times theatre critic] Ben Brantley described it, 'The effect is more like watching a vibrant, exquisite fawn seen through the lens of a hunter's rifle.'"

The producers faced an uphill battle, she said, trying to reconcile the quest for an authentic, genuine replica of life in the annex where Frank's family hid while establishing a non-sectarian message that would gain universal appeal.

The latter was particularly emphasized by Otto Frank, who was reportedly eager to emphasize the universality of his daughter's message and her keen interest in human rights.

Over the years, "each generation creates its own Anne and its own interpretation of the play," Nahshon said.

Shandler and Nahshon are both working on an upcoming collection called Anne Frank Unbound: Media, Imagination, and Memory.

Supporting fertility preservation

Compiled by CJN Staff

Future, a non-profit organization that provides fertility preservation and information support services to cancer patients and oncology professionals, is holding its first Toronto fundraising event, An Evening of Hope, May 10 at Hart House.

The organization, which was founded four years ago, has been raising funds and awareness about young cancer survivors who are made infertile through chemotherapy, radiation or surgery.

Fertile Future's programs include Power of Hope, which helps subsidize the cost of fertility preservation for men and women before their treatments.

Andrea Unikowsky, co-chair of An Evening of Hope, said that "when 20- and 30-somethings are diagnosed with cancer, they are swept into a world that is often geared for patients double or triple their age and who have already had families.

"Oncologists may not always have the resources to address the needs of this group, and patients may not have the financial or emotional resources to do so," she said.

Fertile Future helps by supporting patients and oncology professionals and, in many cases, helps to offset the financial costs of fertility preservation.

Unikowsky said that Fertile Future has developed a network of medical professionals within hospitals and communities that discuss fertility-preservation options with patients.

Agriculture, Judaism blend at Kavanah Garden

Meir Shenhav
Special to The CJN

Risa Alyson Cooper, director of Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs, welcomes me to the organization's Kavanah Garden, with her trademark smile.

The organic, educational garden near the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont., was featured in the 2011-2012 Slingshot: A Resource Guide to Jewish Innovation, an annual compilation of the 50 most inspiring and innovative projects and programs in the North American Jewish community. It was the only Canadian project listed.

CJN: Is it really possible to mention agriculture and Judaism in the same breath?

Cooper: Absolutely. Judaism has an incredibly rich agricultural tradition. Our ancestors were farmers, and many of the Jewish holidays reflect this deep connection with the land and its seasons. For example, Pesach, Shavuot and Sukkot are all harvest festivals celebrating the earth's abundance. They sustained our ancestors and their communities. As well, many of Judaism's social justice ethics are agriculturally rooted. The law of pe'ah [leaving the edges of your fields untouched so that people in need can come and harvest for themselves] is a form of tzedakah that directly relates to agriculture.

Cooper: The majority of the agricultural laws outlined in the Torah are only applicable to biblical Israel. But, I believe the lessons inherent in these laws are incredibly relevant to our contemporary North American community. These laws demonstrate a strong tradition of a Jewish food justice – of ensuring that everyone in our community has access to healthy and nourishing food. It is incredibly important that we remember that food justice is a Jewish ethic, and that we have a responsibility to ensure equal and fair access to food and life resources in our community.

Risa Alyson Cooper

We start by taking Jewish holidays, rituals and prayers and thinking of how we can use the garden as a setting to teach about these parts of our tradition in a way that is hands-on and meaningful.

CJN: What kind of programs do you run?

Cooper: Shoresh runs a number of different programs. At Kavanah Garden, we run field trips for schools, synagogues and camps. We also host a weekly free family drop-in program [beginning in June] and the Kavanah Kids summer program.

We host an organic gardening workshop for adults and offer volunteer opportunities for bar mitzvah students. As well, we host a weekly Community Supported Agriculture (CSA) program in partnership with a young Jewish farmer, where members receive weekly shares of fresh, local, organic produce.

We also host gardening and environmental workshops across the GTA and seniors programs at Baycrest. We're currently developing community events for Shoresh's Bela Farm, our new 115-acre farm, just an hour outside of Toronto.

CJN: Can you draw a profile of your volunteers? What are your other resources?

Cooper: Our volunteers are a diverse group from high school students to seniors, master gardeners to folks who have just planted their first tomato. Our funding comes from grants, individual donors and fee-for-service programs such as our school field trips and CSA memberships.

CJN: What do you grow and what do you do with the harvest?

Cooper: We grow over 100 varieties of organic vegetables, herbs and native wildflowers. Each year, we harvest more than 500 pounds of fresh, organic produce, which is donated to Ve'ahavta. They prepare the vegetables into delicious and nourishing soups and stews for community members in need.

CJN: What is your vision for the future?

Cooper: This is our last year at our current location. Next year we will relocate the garden to a permanent location on UJA of Greater Toronto's Lebovic Campus. The UJA has supported us from the beginning by giving us access to land and helping us develop our young organization. Our vision is to grow, not only our harvest, but our community of friends who see the garden as an integral feature of Vaughan's Jewish landscape.

Teen urges peers to volunteer

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Shane Feldman, a teen who is no stranger to the concept of tikkun olam, hopes the Count Me In Conference he founded will inspire his peers to "get off their butts" and give back.

It may be hard to believe that the 17-year-old Westmount Collegiate senior has experience in this area, but Feldman's May 1 event, held at the Living Arts Centre, was his second attempt at inspiring members of his generation to volunteer and promote positive change.

Last year, Feldman led a one-day event called the World Youth Conference that attracted some 400 Ontario students and teachers.

"Last year was a pilot event to test the water," Feldman said, adding that he decided to rebrand the initiative with a new name: Count Me In Conference (CMIC).

"We've grown from about 400 youths from certain areas in Ontario to over 1,000 from all over Ontario, and it's growing into a national event over the next few years, so we're looking at some exciting things ahead. The Ontario Ministry of Education supports our endeavours, so that's also really exciting for us."

Some of the speakers and performers at the four-hour event included Shut Up and Dance singer Victoria Duffield, Life With Derek actress Ashley Leggat, 11-year-old dancer and semifinalist on Canada's Got Talent Shale Wagman, as well as Ontario Education Minister Laurel Broten, and motivational speaker Andy Thibodeau.

"The other part of the event is an hour-long charity marketplace, which is essentially a trade show with nonprofits and NGOs and charities from all over the province with the aim of getting students to sign up and volunteer," Feldman said.

Shane Feldman

"A lot of times you'll get that motivational speech, and then you go on your way, but we actually hold their hand through the process and make sure there is that tangible way for them to take this inspiration to get involved and actually do it."

He said more than 30 charities and NGOs made up the marketplace, including the Jewish National Fund.

"Everything comes down to getting kids off their butts and involve them in whatever way they want to."

He added that this event is about getting your hands dirty, not donating money.

"We're trying to get away from the mentality of putting money in a jar, versus using your two hands and getting involved in the community," said Feldman, who volunteers with a number of NGOs, including Pencils of Promise and Invisible Children.

The event, run entirely by student volunteers and sponsored in part by TD Bank and Fabricland, has also partnered with WoW Living TV to air an hour-long webcast featuring highlights from the conference and backstage footage.

The webcast will go live on May 8 at 8 p.m. at www.cmiMovement.com.

McMaster JSA director retires after 14 years

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When Judy Schwartz walked into McMaster University's Jewish Students' Association (JSA) office to report for her first day of work as the new director in 1998, she was greeted by an empty desk and a rotary phone.

"I thought to myself, 'Now, what do I do?'" she recalled.

Schwartz spent the next 14 years building JSA's presence at McMaster, providing students with a safe place to hang out, fostering pride in their Jewish identities, and advocating on their behalf.

This past school year, which wound down last month, was Schwartz's last as JSA's director.

Schwartz, 65, decided to retire from a position she never saw as merely a job.

"I have learned more and accomplished more because of the amazing students that I worked with, met and enjoyed. My life has been enriched beyond belief. This to me is not a job. It's a vocation. I loved my job and I'm going to miss it, but my time has come."

Schwartz explained that she was offered the position in 1998 to replace the late Sheila Freedman, who was battling cancer.

As a Jewish community volunteer for many years, Schwartz was eager to take on a new challenge.

Judy Schwartz

"But I accepted the job not knowing anything about it. And because Sheila was so ill, I really had no way of talking to her," she said.

"In the beginning of my tenure, I had no idea what a computer looked like. I didn't know how to use one."

So she bought a computer and took a course to learn how to use one.

"Now I had a desk, a rotary phone and a computer," she said with a laugh.

Schwartz was initially hired to come in for just five hours, once a week, but quickly realized that wouldn't suffice, so she increased her hours to three times a week.

"Most of the students are living away from home. I would say without knowing for sure, that 95 to 99 per cent of our students [come from] outside of Hamilton. It really is not a commuter school... I knew that we needed something more on campus than just the five hours a week," she said.

"We wanted McMaster to have an amazing Jewish experience, and we wanted to provide all students with what they needed on our campus," Schwartz said.

When she first started at McMaster, Schwartz served her 80 or so members with social events and programming that promoted Jewish traditions.

"Then all of a sudden, the Second Intifadah happened [in 2000], and these new groups on campus were formulated, like Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, and they were a major adversary."

She said the initifadah changed life on campus forever.

"The antisemitism that I could never imagine existing at this point happened at our campus."

On a number of occasions, swastikas were drawn on the JSA office door and a sign that welcomed students to the JSA was routinely taken or knocked down.

"I had hate mail sent and I actually had to get the hate crimes unit involved to track the hate mail... That's when I think the community started to realize... the importance of Jewish identity, the importance of Israel identity, pride in our faith and pride in our heritage [on campus]," Schwartz said.

"I also knew it was important for me to network, and so I got to work on campus learning who the chaplains were, who the human rights equity officer was, and so on," she added.

She said the focus of the JSA had to shift to accommodate the challenges faced by Jewish students.

"I learned at the time that when you stand up for Israel, you have to know who you are. We tried to bring to campus learning and pride in our Jewish roots."

She said things took a turn for the better later in 2000, when she learned about a new initiative that was sending young Jews on free trips to Israel.

"I get a phone call one day and someone is screaming in my ear, 'We're going to Israel! We're going to Israel!' I said, 'What are you talking about?' That was the first time I had ever heard the words Taglit Birthright," she said, adding that the program was "the best thing to happen for the Jewish people."

Today, Schwartz estimates that there are about 800 Jews at McMaster, and JSA membership has jumped from about 80 students in 1998 to about 375 members today.

Until the very end, Schwartz advocated on behalf of her students and maintained relationships with faculty and administrators on campus.

"I was very fortunate to be part of PACBIC, the president's advisory committee on building an inclusive community. I sat on the council, and I brought what's important to the Jewish students on campus to these meetings."

Adira Winegust, outgoing JSA vice-president, who has known Schwartz for four years, admired her for being such a strong advocate for Jewish students.

"She was often the one who would go to the administration with student concerns. This year, for example, there were scheduling problems with the mid-terms and the chagim," Winegust said.

"She was also very supportive of students' initiatives. This year I organized an all-women Megillah reading [on Purim] for the first time at Mac, and she was very supportive of that."

But Winegust, who is originally from Toronto, saw Schwartz as more than just a Jewish community professional. She was also a mother figure.

"When I was in second year, I contracted swine flu. I came into the JSA office early one morning saying, 'I'm not feeling well,' and Judy says to me, 'If you end up in the hospital, call me and I'll come.'"

Winegust said that by the time she got home, she had a 40-degree fever. Her roommate rushed her to the emergency room, but it would be nearly two hours before her parents would arrive in Hamilton from Toronto.

"I did end up calling Judy, and she ended up staying with me in the emergency room until my family came."

Winegust said most of all, she'll miss Schwartz's warmth and her ability to make anyone, Jewish or not, feel welcome in the JSA office.

"We're really going to miss Judy."

And Schwartz said she's really going to miss them.

"Working with students, seeing them grow, seeing them mature, become good citizens of the university – every day it was a joy to see that. I'm going to miss it."

Sisters-in-law shake up salad dressing biz

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Sher Kopman always adored the green salads her sister-in-law Michelle Cass whipped up. "They were simple but incredibly delicious," she said.

Like everyone else who had ever tried Cass's salads, Kopman was impressed by their perfect balance of tantalizing tastes.

Cass's salads were perennially popular, largely because of her dressings. Concocted from scratch, they were a meld of olive oil, vinegar and maple syrup.

Michelle Cass

Sher Kopman

Cass had always stayed clear of commercial dressings, considering them unhealthy and less than tasty or nutritious because they contained fillers, preservatives and refined oil and sugar.

Although Cass was something of a magician in the kitchen, it never occurred to her that marketing her dressings might launch a business career.

It was left to Kopman to suggest that the dressings might appeal to the public. It was one of those eureka moments that can change lives.

"I imagined that a healthy version of a traditional salad dressing would sell," Kopman said.

Cass, who has a background in holistic nutrition, was initially not impressed. Boring, she thought. "But as the idea stewed in my mind, I got more excited," she recalled. "We both share a passion for healthy, great-tasting food."

Acting on this deceptively daring concept, they conducted intensive research and testing, during which they refined their product.

Cass and Kopman launched RawFoodz Inc. in October 2010, starting with a modest line of kosher-certified salad dressings, all of which are organic, vegan, and nut- and gluten-free.

The first four dressings, French Fusion, Glorious Greek, Purely Poppy and Sea-zar Serenity, were followed by Japanese and Italian dressings.

Their newest one, Ranch Revival, is due to be unveiled soon. Another dressing, Pomegranate Passion, may hit shop shelves one day soon.

Containing such high-quality ingredients as antioxidants, vitamins, minerals and essential fatty acids, the dressings can be used not only in green salads but in pasta dishes as well.

RawFoodz dressings can be purchased in major supermarkets including some Loblaws and Sobeys stores, and in gourmet and health food stores in Ontario and Nova Scotia.

They can be ordered online, too.

In the near future, the dressings are expected to be distributed in western Canada and there are plans to distribute them in the United States.

Sales were slow at first. "It was very hard at the beginning," Kopman said.

"But we were always confident of success," Cass said, noting that their company is now profitable and on an upward climb.

Their products are made in a 2,700-square-foot facility in the north end of Toronto. Cass, 39, is in charge of blending and manufacturing, while Kopman, a 37-year-old graphic artist by profession, handles such tasks as labelling, packaging, administration and public relations.

They are assisted by one employee.

Now that their salad dressings have gained acceptance among consumers, Cass and Kopman are hard at work perfecting a line of dips and marinades.

"We want to give people healthy and convenient alternatives," Cass said.

Kopman sounded a similar theme: "Our intention is to make it convenient for everyone to enjoy healthy, delicious and nutrient-rich foods."

Kosher, eco-friendly not exclusive: panel

Jodie Shupac
Special to The CJN

Rabbis, farmers, foodies, academics and activists – plus 110 attendees across the denominational spectrum – participated in the second annual food conference hosted by Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs and University of Toronto's centre for Jewish studies in an afternoon of panel discussions.

From a lesson in backyard chicken farming to a "benching from the heart" workshop, the 11 talks were dynamic and diverse.

Aaron Gross, CEO of Farm Forward, an animal welfare non-profit group, and Jonathan Abrahams, executive chef and director of operations at The Healthy Butcher, which specializes in certified organic meats, looked at the question of reconciling kashrut with contemporary ethics related to animal slaughter.

Gross spoke of what he called "big kosher's complicity" with the injustices of factory farming, referring to People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals' (PETA) 2004 exposure of animal cruelty at AgriProcessors – the former Iowa-based, glatt kosher slaughterhouse giant.

Reports that about 20 per cent of cattle were conscious during tracheal and esophagus extraction did not stop the Orthodox Union from saying it was still kosher, Gross said.

Kosher curds come to food conference

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

For most of us, the phrase "curds and whey" doesn't mean much, but for Ruth Klahsen of Monforte Dairy, curds and whey are a way (whey?) of life.

At the Shoresh Food Conference this winter, Klahsen joined Rabbi Aaron Levy and Andrea Most for a panel on "Kosher Curds," which looked at the ramifications of kosher cheesemaking.

Klahsen, of Mennonite origin and knowing little about kashrut, offered historical insights, while Rabbi Levy, a graduate of the Orthodox Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, presented halachic and traditional Jewish viewpoints. Most, associate professor of American literature and Jewish studies at the University of Toronto, moderated and fielded questions.

Cheese is made by coagulating the milk, then separating the solid proteins (curds) from the watery liquid in which they're usually suspended (whey).

The easiest way to make cheese, Klahsen said, is to leave the milk overnight. It will acidify itself naturally, curdling to produce soft, fresh cheeses like chèvre. But for a solid cheese that stays fresh all winter, you need a higher concentration of protein, which calls for a coagulant, usually rennet, an enzyme complex historically found in calf stomachs, although a vegetarian version is now available.

This is where where kashrut comes in, and Rabbi Levy explained the Halachah behind the derivation of rennet, presenting a series of sections from the Mishnah and Shulchan Aruch explaining permitted and forbidden sources of rennet.

High Court refuses to hear case involving neo-Nazi

Compiled by CJN Staff

OTTAWA — The Supreme Court of Canada has declined to hear a challenge to a contempt of court ruling brought by the head of Canada's National-Socialist Party.

The High Court gave no reasons for its decision, leaving intact a Federal Court of Appeal ruling that found Terry Tremaine in contempt of court.

Tremaine, a former math lecturer at the University of Saskatchewan, was ruled in contempt when he refused to comply with a ruling of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, which found he had promoted hate through Internet postings that attacked Jews, black and Aboriginals. The tribunal had ordered him to stop posting the comments and fined him $4,000.

Quasi-judicial bodies such as the Human Rights Tribunal can impose fines and make orders, but these are enforceable only when registered with the courts.

In November 2011, the Federal Court of Appeal ruled Tremaine in contempt. At that point, failure to comply could be enforced as contempt of court. The maximum penalty is five years in prison and a fine.

Tremaine posted on extremist forums under the name "mathdoktor99," and the National-Socialist website, which is decorated with a swastika and features a picture of Adolf Hitler, as well as crude antisemitic propaganda accusing Jews of running secret cabals aimed at world government.

Tremaine was first brought before the Human Rights Commission in April 2005 by Ottawa lawyer and former Commission employee Richard Warman.

The tribunal ruled in February 2007 that Tremaine had "engaged in a discriminatory practice on the ground of religion, national or ethnic origin, race and colour, in a matter related to the usage of a telecommunication undertaking."

Former Nazi's past to be re-examined

OTTAWA — The federal government will re-examine the case of a Nazi collaborator living near Montreal, two senior cabinet ministers told a meeting with Holocaust survivors last week.

The survivors were brought to Ottawa by the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre to urge Justice Minister Rob Nicholson and Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney to take action against Vladimir Katriuk after new evidence surfaced implicating the 90-year-old Quebecer in a wartime massacre of villagers in Eastern Europe.

Pizza Bagel explores mixed dating

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Pizza Bagel is a short comedic film that looks at mixed dating.

It's the story of a traditional Italian father who has the task of preparing a kosher dinner for his son Tommy's Jewish girlfriend, Rebecca.

"Our aim was to make the film centre around the cultural similarities and differences of the Italian and Jewish people, as opposed to the religious differences," said director Joe Mari, 28, who's also the co-writer for and founder of the production company Roulette Pictures.

"This approach allowed us to hone in on two of Italy and Israel's greatest passions – food and soccer."

Alona Metzer, the Jewish actor who plays Rebecca in Pizza Bagel, said that from the moment she met Mari, the similarities between the Jewish and Italian cultures, among them food and large families, seemed to be almost all they could talk about.

"I was happy that our conversations were used as the inspiration for this film, because I feel it sends out a great bottom line," she said.

"We're not as different as we may think if we look past the preconceptions and stereotypes and really get to know each other."

Mari's made his directorial debut in 2011 with the short Stealin' Home, which he intended to screen at the Grindhouse and B-Movie film festivals, but to his surprise, it ended up being accepted by the Cannes Film Festival. It was also shown at the Toronto Independent Film Festival, where it won the award for best sci-fi short.

Italian and Jewish cultures collide in Pizza Bagel.

Another surprise for Mari was that the storyline of Stealin' Home featured gangs versus aliens and two major movies came out that same year with similar premises – Cowboys and Aliens and Attack the Block.

"Knowing ideas similar to mine were worthy of millions of production dollars to studios around the world was a huge vote of confidence," Mari said.

Mari attended York University and completed an honours degree in criminology, all the while filling his electives with as many film courses as possible.

He got a job at one of Canada's largest film production and distribution house, where he met Bruce MacDonald and Paul Haggis, two filmmakers who inspired him.

Mari decided to start his own company and tell his own stories. "It wasn't easy, given the fact that I had no real prior experience in filmmaking. However, I didn't let this stop me," he said.

"I made self-education and networking my two main objectives over the first year. I read as many university film-course texts as I could get my hands on, and held countless interviews with cinematographers, writers, actors and animators."

Mari co-wrote Pizza Bagel with Michael Pillarella, who plays Tommy in the film and is an executive producer at Roulette Pictures. The two spent a fair bit of time together at Toronto's Columbus Centre, a community centre whose membership is primarily Italian and Jewish.

"We couldn't help but notice the interaction between the two faiths," Mari said.

Pizza Bagel also stars award-winning comedian, actor, TV host and writer Carla Collins, who worked with Mari on his previous film. "I admire his vision, enthusiasm and sense of humour and look forward to working with him again," she said. "I like to joke that I am the Uma Thurman to his Quentin Tarantino!"

Mari plans to develop Pizza Bagel into a full-length feature film. For more information, visit www.pizzabagelmovie.com.

Wider Mideast focus puts Israel in perspective

On the occasion of Israel's 64th anniversary, let's begin on an optimistic note: it's worth pointing out that, as a result of other factors, recent coverage of the region has generally shown less negativity toward Israel.

First, for more than a year, the media have been far less fixated on Israel than at any time in recent memory. No doubt, important developments in the broader region, from Libya to Yemen – foremost the "Arab Spring" and its fallout – have seized the media's attention. Indeed, this has been true to such a degree that many correspondents who are normally based in Israel have spent a large amount of time elsewhere, including Egypt, Turkey, Lebanon, and even Bahrain.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

While very few journalists have been able to enter Syria to report on President Bashar Assad's ongoing violence against his own people, they have done so from neighbouring countries, including Israel. Russian, Chinese, and Iranian support for a regime widely condemned in the West for its atrocities (which are continuing, even under the UN "peace plan") has only added to the sustained media focus on Syria.

Second, regional upheavals have raised all sorts of questions that have invited much speculation but no definite answers. For instance, will the Arab Spring lead to real democracy? Or will Islamists, who have dominated election results, especially in Egypt, establish yet another form of patriarchal authoritarian rule? Or, as some analysts have predicted, will the Muslim Brotherhood "moderate" toward pragmatism and show tolerance for women and religious minorities?

Third, the apparent failure of American-led NATO forces in Afghanistan to stabilize that country against the Taliban, who continue to create havoc from bases in Pakistan, has added another dimension to regional media coverage. When Pakistan's nuclear arms are taken into account, the high stakes of uncertainty in that turbulent theatre become impossible to ignore.

Fourth, there's Turkey's rise as a dominant economic, military, and diplomatic force. In particular, it should not be missed that Turkey has broken with its former ally Syria and now maintains, at best, a highly ambivalent relationship with Iran (whose regional influence is being challenged and diminished).

Fifth, Iran's continued defiance of the international community as it pursues an illicit nuclear program has dominated the media's radar. It's become clear to all in the region that Iran, having taken steps toward the development of a nuclear weapon, poses a threat not only to Israel, but also to various Arab states, foremost Saudi Arabia. The Saudis have been urging strong U.S. action against Iran and are (reportedly) quietly looking to Israel to also take a lead in this effort. There's no doubt, however, that the Saudis are playing an important behind-the-scenes role in what is developing into an unusual alliance.

The list could go on. The overall point of the issues mentioned above is that they have put an unprecedented burden on the media to cover and analyze. As many journalists and editors will tell you, this has in fact become an exhausting task, as ever-quickening developments sweep across the broader Arab and Muslim worlds. As a result, Israeli issues that, in the past would have seen critical focus have been largely passed over.

To be sure, there are still some who remain fixated upon the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as the cause célèbre, the crux of the region's problems, and Israel's sole responsibility to solve. But they're declining in number. There are also those who would depict Israel, stripped of all context, as the aggressor against Iran – but, again, they belong to a distinct minority.

Today, with the camera's lens opened onto the region as a whole, many journalists who comprehend the swirling forces of internal Muslim conflict (Islamists versus moderates, Sunni versus Shia, Hamas and Islamic Jihad versus nationalists, etc.) understand that the burden to resolve the Israel-Palestinian impasse cannot fall to Israel alone.

They also know that the rejectionism Israel has faced extends beyond the Palestinians, encompassing deeply held attitudes across the Middle East.

CFHU names scholarship for elder statesman

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Yude Henteleff and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem have enjoyed a fruitful relationship going back 40 years, and now the relationship is bearing fruit in a new way.

Yude Henteleff

On April 30, the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) held a reception at the Fort Garry Hotel in honour of the Winnipeg lawyer, human rights advocate and philanthropist. Henteleff was awarded the Bronfman Medal for Meritorious Service, with proceeds from the evening going toward the new Yude Henteleff Mishpatim Scholarship Fund.

"We wanted to honour Yude for all the work he has done for the Hebrew University locally, nationally and internationally," said CFHU president Faith Kaplan. "With Yude's background in law and in promoting education, we thought that the Mishpatim program was an obvious fit."

The Mishpatim program was started in 2011 by Bryan Schwartz, the Asper Professor of International Business and Trade Law at the University of Manitoba. Immediately after the Henteleff tribute evening, 22 U of M law students and two business students left for Jerusalem for a whirlwind trip consisting of lectures by some of Israel's most prominent legal scholars on promoting human rights and democracy, as well as field trips aimed at acquainting the students with the workings of the Israeli legal system.

"It's exciting to me to have Canadian law students learning about Israeli social conditions and human rights in Israel," Henteleff said.

The honoree – a co-founding partner of Buchwald Asper Henteleff along with the late community and CFHU leaders Israel Asper and Harold Buchwald – was introduced to the CFHU by the late Samuel Freedman, the first Jewish chief justice of Manitoba's highest court.

Over the years, Henteleff has served as chair of CFHU Winnipeg, as vice-president of its board of directors and as an associate governor of Hebrew U's board of governors.

He has also delivered lectures in Israel on human rights, most recently to Hebrew U's faculties of social work and education under the auspices of the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies.

He said the Mishpatim program is the latest in a number of joint ventures connecting Hebrew U with universities and government in Manitoba.

As examples, he pointed to joint initiatives in water, land use and aboriginal rights that have linked experts from Hebrew U with their counterparts in Manitoba and Canada.

He added that Israeli constitutional experts are holding ongoing meetings with their Canadian counterparts on the subject of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Liberties. (Israel does not have a constitution.)

Community professionals honoured

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Gerry Daien and Judah Smolack have been cantors in Winnipeg for more than 50 years.

Shlomo Benarroch and Sol Fink served together as the community's shochets for roughly 35 and 25 years respectively. Fink's wife, Rachel, and Gerry Cohen were principals in the Jewish school system in Winnipeg for 16 and 17 years respectively.

Izzy Peltz served for 17 years as the first executive director of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, as well concurrently as executive director of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council for 12 years.

Les Marks was the executive director of the YMHA Jewish Community Centre for 30 years.

These community professionals, who, with the exception of Daien and Smolack, are retired, will be honoured during an evening to be hosted by the Herzlia Adas Yeshurun Synagogue on May 17.

The supper – at the historic Fort Garry Hotel – is intended to kick off an ambitious fundraising drive for Winnipeg's largest Orthodox congregation, with the funds earmarked to pay outstanding debts as well as to cover the cost of refurbishing the nearly 60-year-old south Winnipeg shul building.

"This will be our first major fundraiser in a number of years," said Earl Hershfield, the congregation's president. "We were trying to think of what we could do. At the same time, we wanted to reach out to the larger community. There are a number of annual community awards that recognize volunteers but not so much that honour those individuals who have worked in leadership roles in the community for long periods of time."

Faith Kaplan, the shul's fundraising campaign co-ordinator, said that the honorees represent the community's collective past at the same time that the congregation – which is celebrating its 105th birthday this year – looks to the future.

As with all existing Winnipeg synagogues, the Adas Yeshurun Congregation started in the north end. In 1955, the Adas Yeshurun congregants merged their synagogue with Herzlia Academy, a Jewish school that had opened in south Winnipeg the year before. The renamed Herzlia Adas Yeshurun Synagogue became the first and, for many years, the only Othodox shul to relocate to south Winnipeg, where many north enders were beginning to move. Up until Chabad opened a storefront in south Winnipeg in the late 1990s – and subsequently its own building in the fall of 2010 – the Herzlia was the only Orthodox option in south Winnipeg.

Hershfield adds that the Herzlia is the only Orthodox congregation in Winnipeg, other than Chabad, with a full-time rabbi – Rabbi Ari Ellis.

Hershfield said that the congregation leadership hopes to raise $1.5 to $2 million.

While different options are being considered for the building, Kaplan said that the shul at the least has very old mechanical systems that need replacing.

"We also want to improve the acoustics and make the building more energy efficient and more accessible to the very young and older people with physical disabilities," she said.

The first order of business, though, is to pay off a mortgage incurred for an earlier refurbishment of the building in the early 1990s, Kaplan said. "We would like to pay down all of our debt so that we can address our future needs with a clear slate."

The Herzlia has a membership of 130 families, a regular Shabbat attendance of between 60 and 90 and a yom tov attendance of about 350.

"We have daily minyans and offer a variety of programs throughout the year for all ages," Hershfield said. "Our membership is continually to grow slowly. We have new members joining us from many different parts of the world.

"My family and I believe that Winnipeg needs a strong Orthodox shul, and we want the Herzlia to be that shul."

Exercise can help prevent dementia

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

Dementia is on the rise and will affect 1.1 million Canadians in the next 25 years.

Dementia is the loss of brain function. It affects memory, thinking, language judgment and behaviour. Although it's very common in seniors, dementia isn't a normal part of aging.

Recently the World Health Organization estimated that 35.6 million people are living with dementia today. With a new case being diagnosed every four seconds around the world, that number is expected to double by the year 2030.

A new study has found that keeping active may help protect the brain against dementia. Seniors who were most active were less likely to develop dementia compared to those seniors who were less active. Exercise has been found to significantly increase both mental activity and stability by boosting neuron function in the brain, while decreasing depression and behavioural problems.

Enhanced neuron function means better communication within the brain, causing improvement of symptoms such as confusion, memory loss and comprehension. Specific balance and flexibility training helps to improve mobility by increasing range of motion, which creates independence, which in turn increases quality of life. Improving standing and sitting balance reduces the risk of falls and fractures.

People who exercise regularly are known to have higher levels of cognitive function than sedentary people. Exercise programs for seniors should focus on building endurance, muscle strength, balance and flexibility. Regular physical activity helps to reduce the severity of the symptoms of dementia, even with the progression of the disease.

Aerobic exercise improves cardiovascular health throughout the body, including the brain. Just 30 minutes a day of moderate aerobic activity can improve cognitive function by decreasing disruption between the neurons.

Strength training helps combat the muscle loss associated with aging. By increasing muscle mass, daily tasks such as getting out of a chair or climbing a flight of stairs becomes easier, allowing for more independence.

When learning a new exercise program always check with your doctor and enlist the help of a professional such as a personal trainer or physiotherapist to prevent injury.

Parents lead in fundraising for research on IBD

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

The Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada (CCFC), a leading funder of research into inflammatory bowel disease (IBD) in the country, began with a group of parent volunteers.

Its latest fundraising event is planned for May 8.

"When my son David was about nine years old, he became extremely ill. He went from a strapping, oversized child to an emaciated, sickly boy, and nobody could tell us what was wrong with him. We thought he was going to die," recalled Marilyn Finkelstein, who, with her late husband, Albert, founded CCFC in 1974.

Marilyn Finkelstein

Some three years after David became ill, still without a diagnosis for his condition, Finkelstein heard of Crohn's disease, a term she had never before heard, she said in an interview in her home.

At the medical library at University of Toronto, she found a paragraph by Dr. John E. Lennard-Jones of England, describing the symptoms of Crohn's disease. The instant she read this, she knew: "That's what David's got."

It was 1973 and David was diagnosed shortly afterward.

IBD encompasses two similar yet distinct conditions, one called Crohn's disease, the other, ulcerative colitis. IBD is a chronic and debilitating disease affecting more than 200,000 Canadian men, women and children, according to CCFC. Just over half of have Crohn's disease and the rest have ulcerative colitis. Babies can be born with Crohn's disease, but anyone can present symptoms at any age.

Canada has one of the highest incidence and prevalence rates of Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis in the world, with one in every 160 Canadians having IBD.

Dr. Richard Hamilton, a gastroenterologist at the Hospital for Sick Children (SickKids) was instrumental in getting his patients together with others across Canada in order to raise money for research.

"At that time, there was no Privacy Act, and Dr. Hamilton was able to provide me a list of his patients at SickKids Hospital. I sat down and wrote a letter with the understanding that I didn't know these families and had no idea how they would respond," Finkelstein said.

"Sixty-four parents showed up in the basement of our home. We saw we were not alone – we were going to make something happen!" Finkelstein remembered with pride.

At that initial meeting was Dr. Fred Saibil, a gastroenterologist at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, who, Finkelstein said, has been an invaluable partner in the mission to find the cure for IBD.

"Dedicated, determined, brave, smart, persistent, resourceful – these are words that come to mind when I think of Marilyn," Saibil told The CJN in a telephone interview. "A mother with a sick child, and ultimately with more than one sick child [another son was later diagnosed with a different form of IBD], worked tirelessly to build this new organization and make it grow," he said.

"We received $5,000 from Sick Kids Hospital Foundation through Dr. Hamilton, which was our seed money, and $500 from one of the parents from the first meeting. This is how we began," Finkelstein said.

Education is CCFC's driving force. "We knew if we brought awareness to Canadians..., we could offer individuals and their families the opportunity to form unique networks with others sharing similar experiences.

"Albert and I would criss-cross the country providing educational seminars... and we opened chapters that still exist today," she said.

"In 1975 we raised $20,000 by holding draws, selling tickets, raffling a car for the purpose of research."

A medical advisory board was established with Saibil and Hamilton playing key roles as leaders.

CCFC's work led to the creation of a national charity that has raised more than $71 million for research, the best hope for finding a cure.

"The future is bright because research is very intensive in this field and the numbers of treatments and the kinds of treatments keep increasing and improving," Saibil said.

Mimi Greenspoon, chair of the All That Glitters Gala has been involved with the foundation for over 23 years and certainly understands the importance of research.

"We lost our son, Lee, to IBD in November 2010. Lee fought hard, since he was diagnosed with Crohn's disease when he was 16. He had multiple surgeries, was on every medical cocktail imaginable for years to ease the pain. Our Lee suffered for more than half his short life," Greenspoon said in a phone interview. "We are having this Gala for the families, all the families, so that in the future, our children and our children's children do not have to go through the pain and suffering that Lee and our family went through."

The All That Glitters Gala will be held May 8 at the Allstream Centre in Exhibition Place, from 6-11 p.m. For tickets and further information, visit www.ccfc.ca.

May is Melanoma Awareness Month

Compiled by CJN Staff

To kick off Melanoma Awareness Month, the David Cornfield Melanoma Fund (DCMF) is hosting its annual fundraiser at the Liberty Grand in Toronto on May 7.

Fresh off an exciting year since the launch of the video Dear 16-Year-Old Me, which became a viral sensation, this event is a celebration of the video's success, with the goal of raising funds to continue the work DCMF does to generate melanoma awareness, as well as aid in funding research of this deadly disease

Dear 16-Year-Old Me was launched online on May 2, 2011, and within the first two weeks had been viewed on YouTube by more than one million people world-wide. Since its debut, it has been seen by over 5.5 million people, was the seventh most shared video in 2011 and was translated (due to overwhelming request) into five languages. The video has been viewed in some 150 countries around the world. The David Cornfield Melanoma Fund, established in 2007, aims to save lives by promoting awareness of this potentially deadly disease. It is the most common cancer in the 25-to-29 age group and second most common in the 15-to-29 age group, and its incidence is increasing at alarming rates while the incidence of other cancers is decreasing.

The May 7 celebration takes place in the Liberty Grand Artifacts Room at 25 British Columbia Rd. at Exhibition Place from 6:30 to 10 p.m. Tickets are $125, with all proceeds going to DCMF. Guests are encouraged to wear black, the melanoma awareness colour. To see the video Dear 16-Year-Old Me, visit http://youtube.com/DCMFCanada. For tickets to the fundraiser, visit www.dcmf.ca or e-mail contact@dcmf.com.

In difficult economic times, how can we best help the needy?

Jobs are priority

Due to constraints in the allotted space, allow me simply to set the stage for some of the government action that will be required in the years ahead.

The latest recession and the resulting spike in unemployment temporarily hid from Canadians the true challenge of the future: we're going to have a labour shortage over the decades ahead. As the baby boomer generation begins to retire, our population as a whole will continue to age. Twenty years from now, the ratio of available workers to retirees will fall from 5 to 1 to 2 to 1. This represents a challenge, but also a tremendous opportunity, if we emerge from the resulting restructuring of the global economy on solid ground.

Zach Paikin

Although it may seem counter-intuitive, this labour shortage could be coupled with stable unemployment, due to the fact that many potential workers won't have skills that are in demand. Helping the most needy gain independence (e.g., a job) must be a government priority. I'd urge Canada's different levels of government to pursue three policies.

First, create incentives for universities to direct more funds toward departments that are of greater use to Canada's economy. Second, increase accessibility to post-secondary education while noting that the principal barriers to university education are largely social and not fiscal.

Third, and perhaps most importantly, remove barriers to labour and capital mobility within and between provinces – this is both a social and fiscal issue.

During the last recession, we had to bail out the auto industry largely because its employees weren't capable of working in different jobs. We won't be able to afford that again, due to skyrocketing costs of government services – especially health care – as a result of the upcoming demographic shift discussed above and the need to direct funds toward combating and preparing for environmental and geopolitical change.

Zach Paikin is a Liberal columnist and political commentator and contributes research on international affairs to several Washington-based think-tanks and institutes.

Maintain programs

During difficult economic times, we have no choice but to maintain, and even expand, our programs to assist the needy and most vulnerable people in our community.

We cannot use the excuse that the economy is experiencing a downturn or difficult times, because it is during these times that the needs of this group in our community become even greater.

Lou Greenbaum

Every so often, a community, like any enterprise, must look inward to audit its communal organizations and agencies to look for ways to enhance efficiencies and streamline operations, in order to find the financial means to maintain, support and expand priority programs – be it for seniors living below the poverty line (including Holocaust survivors among us), new immigrants, children and young adults with special needs, expanded education subsidies and many other worthy and necessary endeavours.

Toronto's Jewish community has a well-deserved reputation for being a compassionate and caring community, and it has been, and continues to be a model community for fundraising.

We must ensure that our vulnerable and needy are able to live Jewishly, and with dignity.

Lou Greenbaum is a principal with the Vogue Development Group and serves on a number of community boards and organizations.

An Occasional Feature

Champion caring

As a mandated children's aid society, Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) is very much aware of the dramatic risks associated with today's economic challenges. Our community is by no means immune to child abuse and neglect, violence against women and significant mental health problems. We recognize that economic hardship is predictive of and related to a host of difficulties. Indeed, acute financial stress often represents a tipping point, sending individuals and families into crisis. Sadly, tough economic times also predict funding constraints, as government and other funders tighten their own budgets. It is thus imperative that we skilfully apply limited resources to solving problems effectively.

Richard Cummings

How do we respond to individuals and families in need with compassion, concern and competence? JF&CS' work with needy individuals and families allows us to intervene in this complex and often tragic cycle of risk. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto generously provides direct financial assistance funding through which JF&CS is able to address and reduce the impact of poverty on individuals and families. What makes JF&CS unique is that we wrap a comprehensive array of counselling, mental health, employment and advocacy services around clients who receive monthly or emergency financial assistance. And we ensure that our decision-making and practices are informed by the best available scientific evidence.

Let us be mindful of key imperatives that serve us well in tough times and increase the resilience of our community. First, as a community we must invest in services that are effective and provide a strong safety net. Second, individuals and families suffering the impact of poverty must be treated with dignity. Third, those of us who are able to respond generously to these challenges must do so.

More than ever, we must champion a caring and connected community.

Freedom from dependency

Jewish tradition calls on all Jews to help those in need, a requirement that is even more pressing in difficult economic periods.

The goal, however, is not only to help people get through their immediate difficulties, but to do so in a way that helps them eventually acquire self-sufficiency. In this way, the dignity of the receiver is preserved. Hence, as has often been noted, our word for charity, tzedakah, is best translated as righteousness, which is an essential condition of a decent common life together. Giving to others should not entail humiliating the receiver, but raising him up and providing a way to help him participate in the life of society, as the medieval Jewish thinker Maimonides taught in his eight levels of charity.

Kenneth Hart Green

Much has changed in our modern era of big public and private agencies, which often perform these tasks for us. And yet our tradition says we are not allowed to leave it for "them," for someone else, to handle it. Jews, whether in the most generous or the most destitute societies, have always maintained their own ways of helping those in need, both through individual efforts and volunteer organizations. Perhaps sharing one's time and expertise, or even one's business acumen, in helping others find work may be just as important as monetary donations.

The Jewish way, as Maimonides insisted, is to do what has to be done to alleviate human suffering. But even as the immediate need must be filled, it must also be done so as to help the person who receives it to achieve self-sufficiency and freedom from economic dependency.

Diskin harms his own cause

Ari Shavit
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Last Friday, former Shin Bet chief Yuval Diskin committed three grave acts: he knowingly hampered Israel's Iran strategy; he made a simplistic, incomplete and misleading statement about the nuclear threat, and he violated the norms in any western democracy on the loyalty of senior civil servants.

Speaking about Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Diskin said they've been acting out of "messianistic" impulses and have been misleading the public about the Iranian challenge, and that he has no faith in their ability to launch a war on Iran.

Certain army and police commanders think they know more than democratically elected leaders, so they don't hesitate to lay political bombshells at the leaders' doors. They're not afraid to carry out targeted media attacks. Even though our security technocrats' political acumen isn't always the sharpest, they act as if they've been entrusted by Divine Providence to save the country from its elected government.

Diskin is an Israeli who has earned his keep. He was an outstanding head of the Shin Bet security service who worked day and night in defence of the country and its people. But Diskin is also an aggressive man who acted brutally when he detained national security adviser Uzi Arad and when he pursued Ha'aretz journalist Uri Blau. This time, however, the aggressiveness of our former No. 1 secret police officer was particularly foolish – it harmed the cause he was seeking to advance.

In his speech in Kfar Sava on Friday, Diskin tried to empty the ammunition from the Israeli gun threatening Iran with a military strike. But it's the presence of that loaded gun that has made the international community impose a diplomatic and economic siege on Iran. So by trying to neutralize the military-option gun, Diskin actually increased the risk that the gun will be fired in the near future. Rather than making the prospect of an Israeli assault on Iran's Natanz nuclear facility more remote, he did the opposite.

Diskin, however, did stress a key issue in his speech: the alleged messianism of the key government decision-makers.

Yet Netanyahu and Barak are not messianic, despite what Diskin said.

Quite the contrary. The two men are, however, dogmatically focused on a military solution to the Iranian nuclear challenge. They minimize the risks inherent in carrying out such an operation, and they haven't properly considered alternative solutions.

They give the impression they're locked in on a single course of action, which they're promoting while excluding all others. Such dogmatism should be a matter of debate and criticism. Yes, the critical question raised by Diskin should be addressed, but using a different approach. Netanyahu and Barak must prove they're not being short-sighted on the Iran issue and that they're thoroughly considering all the options.

Netanyahu and Barak are paying the price for their own past mistakes. Anyone who really understood the challenge posed by Iran would have taken three key steps over the past three years. He would have set up a national unity government, he would have launched a diplomatic initiative to give Israel diplomatic legitimacy abroad and national cohesion at home, and he would have prepared the home front and public opinion for the historic moment of truth.

Netanyahu and Barak did none of this. They are approaching this fateful junction as Israel is confused, fragmented and isolated. They are approaching the summer of a lifetime with a yawning gap between their conception of reality and the conception held by the international community, the Israeli military establishment and the Israeli public.

Benzion Netanyahu dies at 102

JTA

JERUSALEM — Benzion Netanyahu, a noted Jewish historian and Zionist thinker, and father of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, has died.

Netanyahu died early Monday morning at his home in Jerusalem. He was 102. Benjamin Netanyahu visited his father for the last time on Sunday evening, a statement issued Monday from the Prime Minister's Office said.

Netanyahu was born Benzion Mileikowsky in Warsaw in 1910, and immigrated to Mandatory Palestine in 1920. He studied at the David Yellin Teachers' College and later at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. His research focused on the history of the medieval Spanish Jewish community and the history of Zionism. Among his books are a biography of Don Isaac Abravanel, a history of the Spanish Marranos, and his major work, The Origins of the Inquisition in Fifteenth Century Spain.

He also authored The Founding Fathers of Zionism, about the lives of the founders of political Zionism – Leon Pinsker, Theodor Herzl, Max Nordau, Israel Zangwill and Ze'ev Jabotinsky. Netanyahu was the editor-in-chief of the Hebrew Encyclopedia for over a decade beginning in the 1950s. He served as professor of Jewish studies at various universities in the United States and concluded his academic career as professor emeritus at Cornell University.

From his time as a student in Jerusalem, he was involved in public Zionist activities. He was a supporter of Ze'ev Jabotinsky and edited a newspaper that also featured Prof. Joseph Klausner and poet Uri Tzvi Greenberg on its staff.

In 1939, Netanyahu travelled to London and persuaded Jabotinsky to relocate to the United States and from there, to mobilize support for the Jewish state. Jabotinsky died shortly after their arrival in the United States, and Netanyahu continued to raise support for the Jewish state throughout the war and afterward.

In this context, he met with many U.S. Jewish leaders of the period, as well as with senators, congressmen, authors, poets and leaders. Upon the establishment of the State of Israel, he returned from the United States and moved with his young family to Jerusalem's Talpiot neighbourhood.

Many people believe that Benzion Netanyahu will also be remembered for his influence on the worldview of his son, Benjamin. The prime minister frequently mentions his father in speeches, speaking of what he has learned from his father.

The prime minister has recounted that the greatest trauma in his father's life was the death of the Benjamin's older brother, Yoni, during the 1976 Entebbe operation in Uganda. Netanyahu has spoken of how he travelled to deliver the news of his brother's death after he received the news from his brother Ido, when he and his parents were living in the United States.

"It was the longest, most difficult journey of my life," Netanyahu said.

Benzion Netanyahu, left, and his son Benjamin attend a memorial service for Yonatan Netanyahu, the eldest Netanyahu son who was killed at the Entebbe rescue operation in Uganda in 1976. [Israel Sun photo]

Speaking about that eight-hour journey from Boston to Cornell University, where his father taught, Netanyahu said, "After that difficult journey, I reached the path leading to the house, and I saw my father walking in the living room. He looked out the window, our gazes met and a look of surprise was on his face. When I entered the house, he asked: 'Bibi, what are you doing here?' A second later he understood and cried out in pain. His cry was followed by that of my mother – I will not forget those cries."

Netanyahu has said the most important lesson he learned from his father is that "whoever doesn't know his past, can't understand his present, and therefore can't plan for his future. He predicted the attacks on the Twin Towers back in the early '90s. He also predicted the threat of tyrannical Islamist regimes attempting to attain nuclear weapons," Netanyahu said.

Benzion Netanyahu was married to his wife, Tzila, for over 50 years. She died in 2000. He was predeceased by son Yonatan, who was killed at Entebbe, and is survived by sons Benjamin and Ido, a doctor, author and playwright.

Toronto woman implicated in Holocaust fraud case

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A Toronto woman has been charged in New York with making false compensation claims on behalf of Holocaust victims.

Luba Kramrish was named in U.S. court documents as part of a much broader conspiracy to defraud the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, an organization established to distribute funds provided by the government of Germany for eligible Holocaust victims.

Nine individuals have pleaded guilty to participating in the scheme and another 10 have been indicted, the court documents, which date to September 2011, state.

Following a pretrial hearing in New York Federal Court last week, a trial was set for Jan. 14, 2013.

According to information provided by FBI investigator Carrie Fisher and alleged in the documents, Kramrish conspired with employees of the Claims Conference to submit false applications for compensation. Once approved, the Claims Conference would allocate pension funds to the claimants. Kramrish would be paid out of the funds, and Claims Conference employees would take a cut as well.

The Claims Conference administers several compensation funds for victims of the Nazis, including a "Hardship Fund" and an "Article 2 Fund."

The Hardship Fund makes a lump sum payment of about $3,500 to those made refugees by the Nazis. The Article 2 Fund makes pension-like monthly payments of around $400 to people who lived under Nazi occupation, in hiding, in ghettoes, in forced labour camps or in concentration camps. Only those earning less than $16,000 a year are eligible.

According to Fisher, the conspirators "used and submitted falsified identification documents, with false dates and places of birth… In addition, documents were fraudulently altered to make it appear that the applicant's persecution history was verified by outside sources."

Some conspiracy participants were "recruiters" who "collected identification documents of people primarily in the Russian Jewish community so that the identification document would be used in support of a fraudulent application to the Article 2 Fund."

According to the court documents, Kramrish's involvement in the plot began when she filled out an application for her mother. Although her mother's persecution history could not be verified, a Claims employee falsified information so that it was ultimately approved. Afterward, "Kramrish began providing documents for other individuals looking to receive payment from the Article 2 Fund." A co-operative witness "estimates that Kramrish provided documents for approximately 20-25 different cases. [The co-operative witness] helped falsify these applications so that they would be approved."

In one case cited in the court documents, Kramrish charged an applicant more than $5,000 for filling out the paperwork for the claim.

Adeena Lungen, a Winnipeg social worker who assists Holocaust survivors with applications to the Claims Conference (and the writer's sister), said the onus placed on applicants seeking compensation from the Claims Conference has gotten "very heavy" in recent years.

"People used to write their narrative and there was checking, but it would seem people were approved more easily," she said.

"I can tell that over the last four years, the burden of proving it has gotten harder." That can be difficult for events that took place 70 years ago, she added.

In New York, the investigation began after the head of the Claims Conference became suspicious of the organization's employees and brought his concerns to the FBI.

According to the FBI, as of October 2011, "these defendants had a hand in fabricating, filing or processing nearly 5,000 fraudulent claims on behalf of non-qualifying applicants. Claims Conference funds have been drained of $57 million U.S. meant for Holocaust victims, and a large portion of the diverted money went into the pockets of corrupt insiders. These were people hired to give, who conspired to take."

Prosecutors allege a group of employees at the Claims Conference led by Semen Domnitser, the director of the Hardship and Article 2 funds, conspired to defraud Germany of the funds. Domnitser was fired from the organization shortly after the fraud was discovered. He has pleaded not guilty to the charges.

Israeli High Court affirms non-haredi conversions

Yair Ettinger
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice affirmed the validity of thousands of conversions by Rabbi Haim Druckman, the former director of the State Conversions Authority, that were called into question by the Rabbinical Court of Appeals in 2008, but the High Court refused to discuss the rabbinical courts' authority to annul conversions in general.

"The Rabbinical Court of Appeals rode roughshod over basic procedural rules and the principles of natural justice," former Supreme Court president Dorit Beinisch wrote. "It demonstrated contempt for the special conversion courts, and above all, it hurt and did a shocking injustice to the petitioners and their children."

The petition was filed by two Israeli women whose conversions were retroactively overturned by the rabbinical courts in 2007 and 2008, 15 years after the conversions had been recognized by the state. As a result, they and their children were retroactively declared non-Jewish.

In both cases, the rabbinical courts annulled the conversions while discussing the women's divorce proceedings, and their decisions were later upheld by the Rabbinical Court of Appeals. But the rabbinical court's ruling went farther than the immediate cases at hand.

A panel headed by Rabbi Avraham Sherman said that thousands of other conversions authorized by the special conversion courts then headed by Rabbi Haim Druckman should also be overturned.

While Rabbi Sherman's statement was not legally binding, it caused many converts to worry that their conversions, too, would be retroactively annulled. This prompted the High Court justices to level harsh criticism at the rabbinical courts' conduct.

"You read it and don't believe it," wrote Justice Miriam Naor in her concurring opinion.

The women and various organizations that joined their petition had asked the High Court to rule not only on their particular cases – which had already been resolved, since their Jewishness had since been affirmed by the Tel Aviv Rabbinical Court during a new hearing on their original cases – but on the rabbinical courts' authority to overturn conversions in general.

Rabbi Seth Farber

The justices declined to do this, however. Justice Elyakim Rubinstein, writing for the court, said the justices preferred not to intervene in this issue right now "out of hope that the buds of systemic change that have sprouted since the petition was filed [in 2008] will develop and bear fruit."

He was referring to a directive issued by the attorney general in 2010 that was drafted with Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar, the president of the Rabbinical Court of Appeals. That directive stated that if a conversion's validity is challenged during a rabbinical court hearing, the case must be transferred to the president of the rabbinical court in question.

In addition, the attorney general must be informed and will become a party to any case that involves a minor – meaning any case involving a woman with children, since annulling her conversion would automatically make the children non-Jewish – or anyone else deemed legally incompetent. This will make it harder for rabbinical courts to overturn conversions without a fight.

But the High Court did overturn Rabbi Sherman's 2008 ruling denouncing all conversions by the special conversion courts, as well as the initial ruling by the Ashdod Rabbinical Court that Rabbi Sherman's decision had upheld. This was a vindication not only for the affected converts, but for Rabbi Druckman, whose good week continued yesterday when he received the Israel Prize for lifetime achievement.

While Rabbi Sherman's ruling was ostensibly based on Jewish law, it was also part of a broader power struggle between the haredi (non-Zionist) community, represented by Rabbi Sherman and the religious Zionist community, represented by Rabbi Druckman.

The government originally set up the special courts headed by Rabbi Druckman to circumvent the rabbinical courts' monopoly on conversions, because the haredi-controlled rabbinical courts had adopted stringent requirements that were seen as deterring potential converts.

Rabbi Seth Farber, chairperson of Itim, an advocacy organization that provides free consulting and information on issues related to the Jewish life cycle, including the conversion process, released a statement in response to the High Court's decision last week.

"We are happy to see that the High Court of Justice has upheld our claim, and hope that this ruling will serve as a cry of support for those in the middle of the conversion process, as well as anyone considering it. Let us hope that this ruling will put an end to the phenomenon of unrecognized conversions, and do away with the continuing sorrow converts are forced to endure," Rabbi Farber said.

Mere 'ink on paper'

Moussa, who served for 10 years as Egypt's foreign minister under former president Hosni Mubarak (and left his post over disagreements with Mubarak), differentiates between the Camp David Accords, which include the Palestinian articles, and the peace treaty between Israel and Egypt, signed in 1979.

The Egyptian public does not necessarily make the same distinction, however. The Camp David Accords are seen as one whole, and all public discussions of them are seen as a test of the foreign policy that is expected of Egypt's presidential candidates, and mainly the code according to which U.S. policy toward each candidate will be decided.

In a visit to the west of Egypt two weeks ago, Moussa described the Accords as "ink on paper whose period of authority is over," without differentiating between the articles that deal with the Palestinians and those that deal with peace with Israel. Although Moussa is leaning on the support of some of the secular parties and activist groups that were the backbone of the January revolution, Islamist leaders are actually the ones talking about their commitment to the Camp David Accords.

The head of Salafi Al-Nour party, Imad Al-Din Abd Al-Ghafour, for example, said last December that his movement is not opposed to the Camp David Accords and that it is ready to negotiate with Israel. Representatives of the Muslim Brotherhood movement, including Khairat Al-Shater, who, until recently, was their candidate for president, also emphasized their commitment to the Camp David Accords, and have passed on this sentiment to the U.S. administration.

Population grows 1.8%

Israel's population has surpassed 7.8 million, a growth of 1.8 per cent or an additional 137,000 new citizens since last year, according to the country's Central Bureau of Statistics. Israel's Jewish population comprises some 75.3 per cent of the total population or 5,931,000 people, while the Arab population, 1,623,000, is 20.6 per cent of the total. Other groups, (327,000 people) comprise 4.1 per cent.

Iran wants nukes: Barak

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said the chances Iran will give in to pressure to stop its suspected nuclear program are low and the dangers of a nuclear Iran outweigh the dangers of action to stop it. Barak said a nuclear Iran would launch a regional nuclear arms race and embolden Iranian proxies. Barak said confronting Iran militarily would pose dangers and the chances of success aren't "marvelous," but a nuclear Iran poses even greater dangers.

Iran's path unclear: IDF chief

Iran hasn't decided whether to manufacture a nuclear bomb, the head of Israel's military said. Tehran "is going step by step to the place where it will be able to decide whether to manufacture a nuclear bomb," Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz said last week. "We're in a period when something must happen: either Iran takes its nuclear program to a civilian footing only or the world, perhaps we too, will have to do something," he said.

Druze envoy named

A Druze professor was appointed Israel's chief diplomat in New Zealand. Naim Araidi, who teaches Hebrew literature at Haifa University and Bar-Ilan University, was named to the post by Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman. A native of Kfar Marrar in the Galilee, Araidi won the Prime Minister's Award for Hebrew Literature in 2008. He received his doctorate in Hebrew literature from Bar-Ilan. His poems have been published in more than a dozen languages. Some 7,000 Jews live in New Zealand, mainly in Auckland and Wellington. Araidi is Israel's third Druze ambassador.

Institute encourages high-tech innovations

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It's pretty clear that Leonid Bakman is a big-picture sort of guy.

A successful entrepreneur, he's got a history of developing "seed-stage" high-tech companies in Israel, but in recent years, he's shifted from the micro world of commercial ventures to the macro world of turning Israel into a world leader in science, technology and industry.

Bakman is the founder and executive director of the Israel Science, Technology and Innovation Policy Institute (ISTIPI), a non-governmental organization that is attempting to foster innovative thinking, new business models and collaborative efforts that bring together academia, government and business.

Or, as ISTIPI states in its promotional material, the goal is to position "Israel as a global innovation centre."

Although Israel is known as "startup nation," more has to be done to ensure the country can play with the big boys, develop its human capital and create wealth that benefits a greater percentage of the Israeli population, he said.

If Israel is to be known for its advances in science, technology and innovation, "it should be developed properly," he added.

Bakman, who serves as a consultant in science, technology and innovation strategic development and policy design to the National Economic Council of the Prime Minister's Office, was in Toronto last week to solicit support from Canadian businessmen. Accompanied by Allan Reitzes, a former head of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, he met potential supporters and partners, with the pitch of participating in ISTIPI's innovative projects.

He also had meetings with the policy adviser to Ontario's Minister of Economic Development and Innovation, with Anne Golden, president and CEO of the Conference Board of Canada, and with academics.

Bakman explained his strategic outlook during a visit to The CJN. Israel has some successes in high-tech industries, but it cannot rest on its laurels. Someone, such as ISTIPI, must take the initiative and create an environment in which the private sector and government co-operate in developing new areas of growth in high tech that create innovative products and allow more Israelis to share in wealth creation.

Take agriculture, he suggested. There has been a revolution in production in recent years, and Israel has had its share of innovations, but what is absent is a "platform" to bring together stakeholders "under a unifying vision to promote this ecosystem." That could mean bringing together people to take advantage in seed technology, land use, water use, the employment of fertilizers, computer technology and other innovations in ways that currently may not be contemplated.

Another area with the potential for great advances is health. Diagnostics and health management, "all is data driven," Bakman said.

A way has to be developed that will bring together disparate areas like genome analysis and personal health records so more effective treatments can be developed, he said.

ISTIPI's goal is to "develop a platform that brings interests together," he said.

ISTIPI has already helped launch a pilot project looking at innovations in health care and is co-operating with the government of Israel to set up a similar pilot program in the area of agro-tech.

Reitzes, a consultant to a number of large Jewish organizations, believes Diaspora participation in ISTIPI's programs "is good for Israel, the Jewish community and the world."

Leonid Bakman

The Israeli economy benefits from innovation, and people around the world are better off if food or health management is more accessible, he said.

"We need to tell positive stories about Israel," Reitzes said, "what it's able to do and how it benefits people all over the world."

El Al mulls splitting into two airlines

Zohar Blumenkrantz
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — EL Al Israel Airlines is considering splitting into two companies as part of a new strategic plan.

One of the two companies would specialize in premium long-haul flights to destinations such as the United States and the Far East, while the second would compete against low-cost airlines on European routes.

The two firms would share the same management.

Israel and the European Union (EU) recently signed an open skies agreement that will see El Al face increased competition. Efficiency measures would help the airline meet the expected pressures.

The long-haul company would use El Al's new wide-body planes, including Boeing 777s. The planes would be upgraded with fully reclining seats, and ticket prices would be set accordingly.

The second company would use El Al's smaller planes, including Boeing 737s. This would help it compete against low-cost airlines, which are expected to increase Israeli operations once the open skies treaty takes effect.

"The company is working to develop a strategic plan involving its future structure," El Al said.

The company lost $49 million (US), last year, and management is in talks with workers over cost-saving measures. El Al is asking workers to accept fewer free flights and to pay for meals based on their salary levels. It also wants to put up flight crews in hotels outside city centres.

In addition, the company's chair, chief executive and board members have accepted 20 per cent salary cuts, while managers have seen their salaries cut by 7 per cent to 10 per cent.

Legendary Canadian music figure looks back

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Before his retirement, Bernie Finkelstein was a legendary figure in the Canadian music industry, a man whose contributions are still keenly felt in Canada.

Now 67, Finkelstein was a record-label owner, manager and promoter of Canadian talent. He established True North Records, managed the careers of Bruce Cockburn, Murray McLauchlan and Dan Hill, among others, and co-founded MuchFact, a fund that was instrumental in launching the likes of Sarah McLachlan, Celine Dion, Great Big Sea and Arcade Fire.

Five years ago, after about 40 decades in this frenetic and challenging business, he decided to retire, feeling burned out.

"I'd been thinking of retiring for a couple of years," he said. "I wasn't enjoying it enough. The business was changing rapidly, and I didn't want to relearn it."

"There was no way I could hit the ball hard enough," added Finkelstein, an ardent baseball fan. "I didn't want to hang on. I saw my due date. I found a good buyer for my business."

Pausing in self-reflection, he murmured, "I never wake up in the morning and say, 'I wish I hadn't retired.'"

Retirement gave Finkelstein – a member of the Order of Canada since 2007 – an opportunity to write his memoirs, True North: A Life Inside the Music Business (McClelland & Stewart), which was officially launched last month in Toronto.

A high school dropout, he wrote the book himself, not having farmed it out to a ghost writer. Snapped up by one of Canada's oldest publishing houses, it was fleshed out by an editor. "But I'm the author and take full responsibility for it," he noted.

Finkelstein completed much of True North in the old country home in Ontario's Prince Edward County he shares with his wife, Elizabeth Blomme, a former publicist and the mother of his two grown boys, Noah and Edan, both of whom have followed in their father's footsteps.

Bernie Finkelstein

Although he's officially retired, he's still gainfully employed. "Right now, I've got more on my plate than I can handle," he said. "There are always things going on."

He no longer maintains an office at True North, one of Canada's oldest independent labels, but he's still its honorary chair.

Since bursting on to the scene in 1969, True North has released more than 500 recordings, 37 of which were gold and platinum releases and 40 of which won Juno Awards. Clearly, True North has played an important role. As he put it, "Our songs are woven into the cultural fabric of Canadian culture."

By now, McLauchlan's Down by the Henry Moore, Cockburn's Wondering Where the Lions Are and Hill's Sometimes When We Touch are beloved made-in-Canada standards.

Finkelstein continues to manage Cockburn's career. "Bruce keeps me busy, but it's not like it was when I was juggling a thousand balls in the air."

One of the founders of the Canadian Independent Music Association, he was born in the old Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto on Aug. 12, 1944, the only son of Harold and Eve Finkelstein, who were respectively from Ottawa and Winnipeg.

Harold, a non-commissioned officer in the Royal Canadian Air Force until his retirement in 1969, was posted at bases across Canada and in Britain, forcing Finkelstein to attend 13 different schools. Before a heart ailment forced his father to take early retirement, he lived in northern Toronto, where he attended Downsview Collegiate.

Describing himself as "an air-force brat," he had a happy childhood. But since the Finkelsteins were usually the only Jewish family where they were stationed, Finkelstein was sometimes called upon to physically defend himself.

"There were times when I had to fight, but I don't remember whether the fights were over my surname or my Jewish background. In places where names like Smith and McCleod were common, some people thought I had a funny name. I don't recall being called a 'dirty Jew,' but it may have happened."

Drawn to music at a tender age, Finkelstein could not get enough of it. "My parents had a record player, and I played music, everything from Elvis and Little Richard to Frank Sinatra and Judy Garland. The big event of my day was turning on Dick Clark's American Bandstand after getting home from school."

Much to his parents' disappointment, he left home at 17, drawn to the bohemian ambience of Toronto's Yorkville district. And though he did not have a master plan, he gradually drifted into the business that would soon define him.

When he was 24, he landed on the cover of Saturday Night magazine in recognition of his association with two bands, The Paupers and Kensington Market.

As time went on, he discovered Cockburn, hooked up with partner Bernie Fiedler for almost a decade, managed groups like Rough Trade and Blackie and the Rodeo Kings and created the Finkelstein Management Company.

In 1969, he founded True North, whose mandate was to promote Canadians. Its first release was by an unknown, Cockburn.

Finkelstein co-founded MuchFact, originally known as VideoFact, in 1984. Dedicated to assisting talented but struggling Canadian recording artists, it was backed by MuchMusic.

MuchFact, having distributed more than $60 million in grants since its inception, has been a force for good. "We were extremely important in the development of the Canadian music business," said Finkelstein, who left the organization in 2011 after a 26-year run.

By his reckoning, MuchFact was a factor in encouraging the federal government to introduce Canadian content rules in broadcasting. "We lobbied for it," he said. "It was a very controversial topic in its day. Canadian broadcasters opposed it. I supported it and thought it was a great thing."

As he looks back, Finkelstein recalls a number of key moments: The Paupers opening for Jefferson Airplane in the mid-1960s and setting off a chain reaction that changed his life; recruiting Hill to True North; steering McLauchlan to a gold single in 1972, and basking in the glory of Cockburn's 1979 hit, Wandering Where the Lions Are.

Yet there is a dark side to the business he so loves.

"It's not for the faint of heart," he observed. "You shouldn't go into it to make a lot of money, though you can. It's a very, very tough and difficult business, full of traps. You may as well take your money to a Las Vegas casino. It moves very fast and doesn't always breed loyalty. There are safer things to do, but I fell into it."

Finkelstein, however, did not fall through the cracks. "I did very, very well," he acknowledged. "When I sold my company, I deposited a seven-figure check in my bank account. I'm satisfied with the results."

Searing eyewitness account of Nazi crimes is reprinted

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Jan Karski, a member of the Polish resistance movement during World War II, will best be remembered for having written a searing expose of Nazi crimes in German-occupied Poland.

Published in the United States in 1944, when the Jewish community in Poland had already been virtually decimated in such death camps as Auschwitz and Treblinka, Courier from Poland: The Story of a Secret State was a bestseller, with 400,000 copies having been sold.

Penguin Classics has reprinted this important book under a new title, Story of a Secret State: My Report to the World. A raw, blistering account of a nation under brutal occupation and unimaginable duress, Karski's book was a bombshell, alerting Americans to the Holocaust.

At the behest of the Polish government-in-exile in London, Karski, a former diplomat born in Lodz in 1914, twice visited the Warsaw Ghetto and had himself smuggled into Izbica Lubelska, an annex of the Belzec concentration camp. These visits shocked him to the core of his soul and turned him an invaluable witness to unprecedented crimes against humanity.

On trips to Britain and the United States, where he met U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt, among others, Karski relayed this chilling information to the Allies.

After the war, Karski settled in the United States, became a naturalized citizen and began a 40-year career as a professor at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C.

The French filmmaker Claude Lanzmann plucked him out of obscurity in 1985 by including him in his epic documentary, Shoah.

Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem, recognized him as a Righteous Gentile in 1982. Twelve years later, Israel conferred honorary citizenship on Karski, who died in 2000. After the fall of communism in Poland in 1989, his role was officially acknowledged.

Karski, whose real name was Jan Kozielewski, was called up by the Polish armed forces upon the outbreak of war in 1939. With Poland having been partitioned by Germany and the Soviet Union after their joint invasions, Karski joined what would be the Polish Home Army. Highly intelligent and possessing a photographic memory, he repeatedly crossed enemy lines as a courier. On one such mission, he was caught by the Gestapo and tortured.

Story of a Secret State is, in essence, a cri de coeur.

"The world I lived in was falling apart around me," he writes of the period following Poland's catastrophic defeat. "I felt like a shipwrecked man in the ocean..." After visiting Poland's capital, he observes: "Warsaw was a shocking ruin of its former self."

Although he remains convinced that Poland will be liberated from the Nazi yoke, he is gloomy: "Everywhere about me I saw chaos, ruins, despair and indescribable poverty. German arrogance and German terror affected everyone..."

Karski's Gestapo interrogator is a brute. As he informs Karski, "I assure you, after a few of our caresses, you will regard death as a luxury."

A Gestapo agent who vainly tries to turn him into a collaborator says, "We do not want to harm anyone. With the exception of the Jews, of course. They will be exterminated. This is the Fuhrer's will."

Disgusted by Nazi massacres of civilians, he notes, "This incredible baseness on the part of Germany will never be forgotten or forgiven."

Expressing defiance, Karski says, "We fought back by every conceivable means in a naked struggle to survive against an enemy determined to destroy us."

In 1942, when Polish Jews are being murdered ruthlessly in town after town, he meets two Jewish leaders in a Warsaw suburb. They are Leon Feiner of the Bund and a Zionist representative whose identity is still unknown.

Their revelations shake him: "Never in the history of mankind... did anything occur to compare what was inflicted on the Jewish population of Poland."

And in great pain, he adds, "The first thing that became clear to me as I sat there talking to them... was the complete hopelessness of their predicament. For them, for the suffering of Polish Jews, this was the end if the world."

Two days later, accompanied by the Bund leader and another Jewish guide and wearing an old, shabby suit and a cap pulled down over his eyes, Karski ventured into the ghetto.

His observations are stinging: "Everywhere there was hunger, misery, the atrocious stench of decomposing bodies, the pitiful moans of dying children, the desperate cries and gasps of a people struggling for life against impossible odds."

In horror, he watches two boys, dressed in the uniform of the Hitlerjugend, shooting a man for the sport of it.

Returning to the ghetto to memorize his visual impressions, Karski subsequently reports his experiences to British and U.S. government officials and Jewish leaders. In London, he meets Szmul Zygelbojm, a Bund leader who, in utter despair, committed suicide.

"Of all the deaths that have taken place in this war," he writes with passion, "surely Zygelbojm's is one of the most frightening, the sharpest revelation of the extent to which the world has become cold and unfriendly, nations and individuals separated by immense gulfs of indifference, selfishness and convenience."

Karski's clandestine inspection of Izbica Lubelska – a way station to Belzec – is horrifying, or, as he puts it, "a ghastly ordeal."

His guide there, a Ukrainian guard whom he mistook for an Estonian, told him of his interest in saving Jewish inmates. Karski asked him, "Are there many more good men like you there who are willing to save the Jews?" The guard replied, "Save them? Say, who wants to save them?" The guard looked at Karski in bewilderment, as if he was a fool. "But if they pay, that's a different story. We can all use some money."

Walking through the desolate camp, Karski is appalled by the sight of its imprisoned Jewish inhabitants, who were rounded up in the Warsaw Ghetto. "The Jewish mass vibrated, trembled and moved to and fro as if united in a single, insane, rhythmic trance... They had become... completely dehumanized... The chaos, the squalor, the hideousness ... was ... indescribable."

He is particularly repelled by the guards' practice of squeezing more than 120 Jews into freight cars that can normally accommodate 40 soldiers and eight horses and of lining the cars with quicklime that burn them to death before too long.

After exiting the camp, he is seized by a violent fit of nausea and vomits for the next two days.

In the final pages of this strong and affecting book, Karski describes his meetings with Allied and Jewish leaders and leaves a reader with the indelible impression that he was a man of resolve, courage and vision.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Aaron Vincent Elkaim's upcoming photographic exhibit documents the history of Jewish Morocco.

His work will be displayed at the CONTACT Photography Festival for the month of May at the Pikto Gallery in the Distillery District in Toronto.

"The title, A Co-Existence Lost in the Wake of Zionism, refers to how Jews and Muslims lived alongside each other in relative peace in Morocco since, really, the beginning of Islam," Elkaim said. "Although an Islamic country, the Jewish People were truly incorporated into the Moroccan identity and structure of the country."

Although Elkaim said he doesn't deny certain dark periods in the history, "on the whole, Jews were considered true Moroccans. They were part of the country's identity, and the country was part of theirs. This is still evident in the nostalgia that exists in those who have left Morocco."

Elkaim's photographic project is "a journey into the remnants of a culture" that captures "an epoch of Judaism existing in peace with Islam." Reviving memories of "a past forgotten in the wake of Zionism," Elkaim said he aims to tell a story at odds with current perceptions of Jews and Arabs.

The Jewish People arrived in the land now known as Morocco more than 2,000 years ago. Protected since the seventh century by the Islamic principle of tolerance, they thrived, holding high positions in trade and government. The Star of David, which appeared on the currency and national flag, was a symbol all Moroccans shared.

During the Holocaust, when asked for a list of Jews, King Mohammed V declared, "We have no Jews in Morocco, only Moroccan citizens." In 1940, Morocco had 300,000 Jews, the largest population in the Arab world. Following World War II, Israel's expansion marked the beginning of an exodus. Today, less than 5,000 Jews remain, Elkaim said.

"The underlying message is simply that coexistence did exist and it worked. I think this is something that is forgotten in today's political climate, where walls are being built to keep people apart. I feel these walls are blocking the view of what once was and what could be again. I'm simply trying to find hope and truth in history, trying to keep that alive."

Elkaim said his inspiration for his exhibit stems from his family's history. "My father was born in the Mellah of Marrakech. He and most of my family immigrated to Canada in the 1960s. They were always very nostalgic of Morocco and kept the culture alive."

He said the culture was always exotic, yet "normal" for him growing up. "I took it for granted. As I got older though, I began to realize that the culture could not last in the same way as the generations move forward. The Jewish traditions may stay strong, but the cultural tie to Morocco would fade."

Before becoming a photographer, Elkaim studied cultural anthropology and film in university. He found photography as a passion after completing his degree, but it took a while for him to pursue it as a career.

"For me the idea of exploring the world and its stories and cultures was captivating. When I began to realize that photography offered the ability to keep exploring and learning, I knew I had found something great, but more importantly, it also offered me direction and purpose for these desires. My explorations were no longer just for me – I now had the ability to communicate the things I was discovering. I could tell stories that I believe are important."

Elkaim said he loves being part of life. "The work I do is a reflection of real life, realities that aren't my own, but that I am privileged to experience and capture. It is the people and their stories and watching them unfold around me that truly captivate me. It's less about a beautiful image than capturing what I am experiencing and conveying a feeling about it."

This year marks the third time that Elkaim is showing his work at CONTACT. He is a founding member of the Boreal Collective, a group of Canadian documentary photographers who had a group show at last year's festival.

Elkaim said he hopes people will react positively to his images of Morocco. "I simply aim to shine a light on a history that might have been overlooked in the current framework surrounding both Judaism and Islam. I feel we often see things in black and white, but this story offers us shades of grey, and I believe that truth and hope usually resides somewhere in the middle."

His favourite image from the collection is of the wind blowing through the curtains of the Al Zama Synagogue in Marrakech. "Everything is blue and so peaceful. You can just feel the presence of a sacred history being preserved within the space."

Wistful documentary launches 20th TJFF

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is celebrating its 20th anniversary this month with an impressive lineup of movies – features, shorts and documentaries – from 15 countries.

A sampler:

Thierry Binisti's A Bottle in the Gaza Sea delves into the Arab-Israeli conflict by means of an unusual and intriguing e-mail exchange.

Tal Levine, an idealistic 17-year-old Israeli, stuffs a high-minded message of peace into a bottle in the wake of a suicide bombing in Jerusalem. Her brother, Eytan, a soldier, throws it into the Mediterranean Sea while on patrol near the Gaza Strip.

Naim, a Palestinian Arab in his 20s, retrieves the bottle and sends Tal a note, launching a correspondence. In response, she writes, "Who I am and who you are is what matters." Naim – a deliveryman who delivers T-shirts to the Israeli border – expresses a desire for a "normal life." Tal, a student, says both sides are to blame for the violence.

This wistful, workmanlike documentary, set on the eve of the 2008-09 war in Gaza, unfolds against the backdrop of Israeli retaliatory air strikes in Gaza. Amid the turmoil, Naim is roughed up by Palestinian police, who suspect him of being an Israeli collaborator, while Tal loses her virginity. The war tests Tal's long-distance relationship with Naim, making viewers wonder whether friendship under such circumstances is possible.

Ilan Ziv's Exile: A Myth Unearthed boldly challenges a religious belief and a historical fact – namely that Jews were driven out of their historical homeland after the sacking of Jerusalem and the fall of Masada.

Ziv claims that compelling archeological evidence – an excavation in the ancient Jewish town of Sepphoris – supports the supposition that the Romans permitted Jews to live in the Galilee after the expulsion of Jews from Jerusalem and Masada. He takes his thesis one step further by speculating that some of the Jews who converted to Islam after the Muslim conquest may be the distant ancestors of the Palestinian Arabs.

Ziv also brings the Bar Kochba revolt and the chronicler Josephus Flavius into the picture and interviews historians and archeologists who subscribe to his theories.

Ronit Kertsner's Torn focuses on Romuald Jakub Weksler-Waszkinel, a Lublin-based Polish priest who was born Jewish and now wrestles with his dual identity. His longtime friend, the chief rabbi of Poland, Michael Schudrich, describes him as a "living conflict." Certainly, he feels "different."

Adopted by a Catholic family during the Holocaust, he learned he was Jewish at the age of 35. Armed with this knowledge, he began working to heal wounds between Poles and Jews and dreamed of living in Israel.

In a touching scene on the eve of his trip to Israel, he bids goodbye to a group of nuns in Lublin. He enrolls in the ulpan of a religious kibbutz and, eager to be recognized as a Jew, he requests temporary residency status from the Israeli government. Yet he also asks for membership in a monastery. Both overtures are rebuffed, prompting a friend to observe that he suffers as a Jew in Poland and as a priest in Israel.

The burning question in this poignant, troubling film is whether he can find acceptance and peace of mind in Israel.

Ami Drozd's feature film, My Australia, is fundamentally about identity and displacement. This Israel-Poland co-production opens in the 1960s in a Polish city as a gang of teenaged hooligans beats up a group of Jews. Among the attackers are Andrzej (Lukasz Sikora), 14, and his younger brother Tadek (Jakub Wroblewski). Arrested by the police, the brothers are released thanks to the persuasive powers of their single mother, Halina (Aleksandra Poplawska).

In the wake of this incident, Halina announces they are immigrating to Australia, a country Tadek fetishizes. En route to their new home, the boys learn that they are of Jewish origin and that their destination is really Israel. Halina, a Holocaust survivor whose estranged husband was a Polish war hero, has been masquerading as a Catholic until now.

Not surprisingly, her sons are none too pleased by the revelation. Tadek, for example, does not want to go to "stinking Israel" or be "a sort of a Jew."

Unable to find a job, Halina sends the boys to a kibbutz, where they are kindly received. Their adjustment to kibbutz life is difficult. Tadek refuses to use the communal showers, and ironically, some of the Israeli kids call him a "stinking goy."

My Australia starts promisingly, with credible performances from an impressive cast, but it slows to a crawl in the second half. Still, this is an interesting film about the pitfalls of mixed identity and the challenges of adapting to a foreign culture.

Eva Gruberova's and Martina Gawatz's Born in a Concentration Camp deals with a little-known topic: Jewish mothers who gave birth in Nazi concentration camps.

Their film focuses on Eva and Miriam, two young women who were pregnant when deported to camps. Eva, a Slovakian Jew, arrived in Auschwitz with a swollen belly, prompting her sister-in-law to advise her to get "rid" of the baby. Eva would not hear of it, so the question was how she could protect her child in Auschwitz.

Eva met six other pregnant women, including Miriam, in the next camp. All their babies were delivered by a Hungarian gynecologist without the benefit of anesthesia. "It's terrible I had to begin my life here," says Eva's daughter, Marika, who was born on Jan. 8, 1945.

The six mothers survived by the skin of their teeth. An SS plan to send them to Bergen-Belsen to die fizzled, and a death march that could have killed them proved to be harsh but not fatal. There is a local angle in this largely upbeat film. Miriam and her family immigrated to Canada after the war and now live in Toronto.

Jakub Wroblewski stars in My Australia, set in Poland and Israel.

Yasmine Novak's The Lost Love Diaries is a heart-rending account of a Dutch Holocaust survivor in Israel who embarks on a quest to find a prewar boyfriend from whom she was separated during the Nazi occupation of Holland.

Shula, a widow, receives a package in the mail. It's the diary of her old flame, Berny. There is no return address, but the diary drives Shula and her daughter to travel to Holland in a bid to track down Berny. They talk to a succession of people who may have known him, but the trail grows cold. Is he, in fact, still alive?

Ian Ayres' entertaining biopic, Tony Curtis: Driven to Stardom, profiles a 1950s pop culture icon through the medium of film clips, home movies and interviews with, among others, Curtis himself, studio colleagues and ex-wife Debbie Reynolds.

Curtis (formerly Bernie Schwartz), an actor who appeared in more than 130 movies, notably Some Like It Hot and Spartacus, was born into poverty in New York, the son of Hungarian Jews. Thanks to a talent scout who spotted him in a high school play, he was offered a seven-year contract by Universal Studios, and Curtis never looked back.

Gorgeously handsome and exuding sex appeal, Curtis was a pinup boy and teenage idol in a succession of low-brow movies until he finally hit his stride as a serious actor in Sweet Smell of Success. Yet Curtis was more than merely a sex symbol. He courageously campaigned for racial equality, thereby risking his career.

But like far too many actors, he abused drugs and took his marriages for granted. As his roles dried up, he desperately clung to the chimera of fame. In true Hollywood fashion, he was buried with his phone, not wanting to miss a call!

Joshua Waletzky's Music for the Movies: Bernard Herrmann is a straightforward portrait of an accomplished Hollywood composer who wrote the score for Citizen Kane, Psycho and Taxi Driver and worked with director Alfred Hitchcock in eight films. Portrayed as a gruff and cranky person who hated the Hollywood system, he is best remembered for his remarkably dramatic but unobtrusive style.

Waletzky's companion documentary, Music for the Movies: The Hollywood Sound, documents its so-called golden age in the 1930s and 1940s, when Jewish composers such as Alfred Newman and Max Steiner were at the height of their considerable powers. Regrettably, the film is far too technical to be wholeheartedly enjoyed.

Peter Rosen's God's Fiddler profiles Jascha Heifetz, who was arguably the 20th century's greatest violinist. A child protégé whose father was a violinist and whose talents were recognized when he was very young, Heifetz was a Lithuanian Jew from Vilna who settled in the United States on the eve of the Bolshevik Revolution.

An intensely private, introverted and conceited individual who could ham it up for a camera, he got the shock of his life early in his dazzling career when a newspaper reviewer gave him a lukewarm notice, almost driving him to commit suicide. No longer complacent, he worked hard to perfect his effortless style.

This first-rate, warts-and-all biopic contains cheerful home movies from Heifetz's archive, interviews with students and associates and clips of his magical performances.

TJFF saves the last film for Doc Pomus

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Rock musician Lou Reed called him one of the greatest songwriters in history and Bob Dylan admired him so much he once asked him to write some lyrics for him.

His life seemed tailor-made for a Hollywood movie. He was the son of poor Jewish immigrants and was crippled by polio. Yet, he became a successful celebrity, got addicted to gambling, lost everything and then got his life back on track.

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is saving its best for last with A.K.A. Doc Pomus, a highly informative documentary on one of the most prolific hitmakers of the 20th century, which closes the Film Festival on May 13.

Born Jerome Felder, Doc Pomus wrote or co-wrote over 1,000 songs including This Magic Moment, Little Sister, Sweets for my Sweet, Viva Las Vegas and Save the Last Dance for Me. His songs were recorded by Elvis Presley, The Drifters, Andy Williams, Ray Charles, B.B. King, Dion and the Belmonts, The Coasters, Joe Turner and several others. In his prime, Doc Pomus had 13 Top 10 songs in one year. He was nominated for the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1992.

A.K.A. Doc Pomus chronicles his life from his beginnings as a young Jewish boy in Brooklyn stricken with polio, to his extravagant 1991 funeral attended by hundreds of the most important people in the music business including Phil Spector and Lou Reed

Doc Pomus was born in 1925 and contracted polio when he was six. He would spend the rest of his life on crutches or in a wheelchair. He was a "white boy hooked on blues" and spent most of his childhood days listening to the radio. At 17, he wowed the manager of a blues bar with his singing and began performing every day. (He changed his name so that his mother wouldn't recognize it on the marquees).

This was quite a start for a fat Jewish boy on crutches. But it was these handicaps that would also let him down. No record company was willing to sign him despite his obvious talent.

Instead, he turned to song writing, becoming encouraged when his song Young Blood became a hit in 1957 for The Coasters and he received a sizable royalty cheque. Because he was already in his 30s, there was a danger that he was out of touch with the vibrant teenage market of the 1950s, and he teamed up with the younger Mort Shuman, who added contemporary stylings to Doc's blues sensibilities.

It was the start of a highly lucrative partnership. Under contract to the top music publisher, Hill & Range, they started to churn out hits, starting with A Teenager in Love for Dion and the Belmonts.

They were introduced to Elvis's management and wrote several hits for him including Viva Las Vegas, which has since been recorded by many other artists, among them Bruce Springsteen, Shawn Colvin, The Dead Kennedys and ZZ Top.

He married the aspiring young actress Willie Burke, and it was at their wedding that he got the idea for his signature song Save the Last Dance for Me. Unable to dance with his wife because of his disability, he let her dance with other men, but reminded her, as the song goes, who will be taking her home tonight "and in whose arms you're gonna be."

Doc Pomus wrote over 1,000 songs

The song was a huge hit for The Drifters and has been recorded by other artists including Dolly Parton and recently Michael Bublé.

The mid-'60s saw the rise of singer/songwriters such as The Beatles and Bob Dylan, and songwriters were no longer in demand. This, and his marital woes, started a downward spiral for Doc Pomus. The hit he wrote for Andy Williams Can't Get Used to Losing You was inspired by his marriage problems.

He turned to gambling to make a living, but around 10 years later, Elvis's death ironically brought him lots of royalties and he was able to leave gambling and devote his attention to writing again, teaming up with the eccentric blues man Doctor John to write songs for B.B. King.

A.K.A. Doc Pomus packs a lot into 90 minutes. Even if you've never heard of Doc Pomus before, you'll still find it extremely moving and entertaining. It's a fitting end to this year's film festival. It screens at the Bloor Cinema May 13 at 7:30 p.m.

Film tells the Roma side of the Shoah

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A stirring Canadian documentary focusing on the plight of the Roma people during the Holocaust will be screened at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

A People Uncounted documents the travails of the Roma in Europe – often pejoratively referred to as Gypsies – who were among those targeted by the Nazis as part of Germany's Final Solution.

According to statistics obtained by the filmmakers, it's estimated that more than 500,000 Roma were murdered during the Shoah.

Aaron Yeger and Marc Swenker, the film's director and producer respectively, told The CJN they hope the Jewish community comes out in force to see the film and recognize that the two communities are intrinsically linked.

Yeger, who is Jewish and whose family descends from Holocaust survivors, said the film can serve as an educational resource for the many who have limited knowledge of the Roma.

"I come from a family of survivors, and [before filming] I didn't realize the extent to which the Jews and Roma were linked" by their shared fate in World War II, he said.

The film does a superb job of editing emotional interviews with Roma survivors, a Jewish survivor (Yeger's grandfather) and Roma and Jewish scholars and historians, who all agree that the tragedy that befell the Roma is woefully underreported and unacknowledged.

The main difference between the two peoples post-World War II is that "unlike the Jews, once the war ended, [the Roma] had no community to embrace and support them and nowhere to go," the filmmakers wrote on the festival's website.

Swenker noted that the film, released last year, also tried to capture much of the modern-day persecution the Roma experience in various European states, most notably in Hungary, where certain members of the ultra-nationalist Jobbik party have displayed open contempt for ethnic minorities.

Swenker and Yeger also turned their lens on France, where the government has dismantled numerous Roma camps and in 2009, deported some 10,000 Roma back to Romania and Bulgaria, followed by another 8,300 deportations in 2010.

Politics aside, A People Uncounted is a beautifully filmed story, complete with an original score by Robi Botos, a Hungarian-born Roma pianist now living in Toronto.

"The intention of this film was to build bridges between the Jewish and Roma communities," Yeger said. "Jews can understand what the Roma went through."

It's estimated the Roma population worldwide is between 13 and 15 million people.

After filming and editing the movie, Swenker said he came away feeling "let-down" by the world community for continuing to mistreat the Roma.

Yeger added that the Jewish community should feel a source of pride, since "much of the support for Roma rights comes from Jewish scholars and advocates."

"At the end of the day, our mandate is to get the Roma story out there," Swenker said. "Hopefully this film will inspire other filmmakers to look at the Roma."

Yeger said he and the film crew recorded more than 20 hours of Roma Holocaust survivor stories and are hoping to put those testimonials into a format similar to what Steven Spielberg used to set up his Shoah Visual History Foundation, which has recorded tens of thousands of Jewish survivors' stories.

The filmmakers noted that the Romany equivalent of the word Shoah is Porrajmos, a term that's becoming more widely used in their community, though many Roma also use the term Shoah to describe what happened to their people.

A People Uncounted will screen at the TJFF at 8 p.m. on May 8.

Octogenarian gearing up for 5-km run at marathon

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

At 83, Harvey Freeman still takes the stairs two at a time, and he's not shy to let you know he can beat pretty much any of his contemporaries in a foot race.

He's done it for the past two years in a row, finishing first in 5-kilometre runs in the 80-plus category at the Goodlife Fitness Toronto Marathon.

Yes, it's true that there aren't too many competitors in his age cohort, but nevertheless, a win is a win.

On May 6, when this year's version of the marathon kicks off, he'll be gunning for a three-peat, but he acknowledges getting the hat-trick will be difficult, because a well-known runner who dominated everyone in the 70-plus range in half-marathons just turned 80.

Still, when you can finish a 5-km race at any age, it's quite an accomplishment.

A few years ago, pounding the pavement would have been the last thing on Freeman's mind.

He was pretty much a couch potato when it came to athletic endeavours. He had played a little shinny hockey when he was younger, but by the time he was 66, he was 20 pounds overweight, smoked and was "a desk-bound executive... I was a typical candidate for a heart attack," he said.

Then, on a trip to the West Coast, the heart attack came. In retrospect, the incident turned out to be a turning point in his sporting life. While still in the hospital, medical staff had him up and walking, and when they discharged him, they recommended he enrol in a rehab program that would keep him active.

When he returned to Toronto, he was put in touch with a clinic at Sunnybrook Hospital, where physical exercise is a key component of the rehabilitation process.

Freeman changed his lifestyle: he gave up the smokes, started eating better and took up exercising. Within nine months, he was able to run two to three kilometres at a time. He eventually maxed out at 15 to 16 kilometres.

He started signing up for competitive races, usually finishing in the Top 5 among the septuagenarian runners. He even travelled to Jerusalem back in 2003, testing himself on a hilly 10-km course near the Knesset on a cold, wet and generally miserable day.

He was gearing up for a half-marathon when he suffered a meniscus injury in his knee. It took almost a year to recover, but when he did, he found he just couldn't get back to the longer distances he had been training at.

He continues to train in the gym in his building, running on a treadmill three or four times a week. With the weather improving, he's back outdoors pounding the pavement and noticing how concrete is so much harder on the legs.

He's limited by doctor's orders to a speed that keeps his heart rate at 137 beats or less, and he wears a heart monitor to make sure he stays at that number.

Freeman is feeling pretty good these days, and running has a lot to do with it. It only shows that "it's never too late to start," he said. "I'm racing against guys who've been racing for 40 or 50 years."

There's "a little silent admiration in some quarters" that he's able to accomplish what he has. And besides, he said, "I like the bragging rights for winning."

Harvey Freeman

Charity basketball tournament aids at-risk youth

Compiled by CJN staff

The sixth annual Hoops 4 Israel charity basketball tournament will take place Sunday, May 6, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. at the Kimel Family Education Centre at 9600 Bathurst Street in Vaughan.

The tournament will feature three-on-three, half-court, round-robin play that makes for fast-paced, competitive games and great entertainment for everyone involved.

Funds raised will go to programs that support at-risk youth in Israel, such as the Zipori Educational Warm House and the Living Bridge Partnership.

In addition, some of the money raised will benefit underprivileged youth in Toronto, giving children the chance to have access to summer programs through the JCC Chai Sports Scholarship Fund and the Centre Camp Scholarship Fund.

Hoops 4 Israel is sponsored by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and is administered by Community Connect, federation's young adult engagement division. The event relies on the collective efforts of dozens of player participants, corporate sponsors, community organization partners and private donors. Since its founding in 2007, Hoops 4 Israel has raised more than half a million dollars.

For more information, contact the organizers at info@hoops4israel.com.

T.O. filmmakers take on 'lo-fi' travelling film festival

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Toronto-based filmmakers Jeffrey Nesker and Justin Kelly hope the blood, sweat and tears they poured into co-directing the travelling Bootleg Film Festival was worth it.

"It's a hell of a lot of work," Nesker said.

"It's planning a wedding with 600 people… and your families are both dysfunctional," added Kelly.

"It's a giant event."

The Bootleg Film Festival is a travelling festival that debuted in 2008 in Glasgow, Scotland. It has since run in Swansea, Wales; London, England, and for the first time, the festival will cross the Atlantic to screen films and host filmmakers in Toronto from May 10 to 12 at the Tranzac Social Club in the Annex.

Nesker, 34, who said he's been in the movie-making biz since the early 1990s, said he was asked to organize the film fest in Toronto, by the founder Tom Wilton, whom Nesker met in 2008 at the Bootleg festival in Glasgow.

Nesker, who won an award for best short film for Nightclub Story, said Bootleg is a "special, little festival," that continues to impact his career.

"It fostered a lot of relationships that have carried through until now. I met quite a few people there that I still talk to now," he said.

Nesker explained that Wilton, an actor turned filmmaker, founded the festival because he was frustrated by the slow pace of the film industry and the hurdles in getting a film distributed.

Wilton created Bootleg to honour the "filmmaker in ripped jeans and battered Converse, shooting lo-fi movies on the rent money, because along the way, we've been that filmmaker," he wrote on the festival's website.

Bootleg will showcase a mixture of short films and features, and will also cater to international filmmakers who will be taken on tours of the local film production houses in Toronto.

The final night of the festival will include an awards ceremony, and the best film will win a 12-month deal with FilmBinder, a film distributer.

"Anyone with some money can go out and make a film, but it's something that looks a lot easier than it is. I think the mandate of Bootleg is separating the wheat from the chaff," Nesker said.

Kelly said that what separates this festival from some of the other more established ones is the accessibility factor.

"Anybody can be a filmmaker, anybody can make a movie. If you want to do it, do it. I would say what separates us is that we encourage handmade films. A lot of the other festivals, if it has that handmade look, they won't get past minute 4 of your screener," Kelly said.

"We're encouraging of the underdog."

Both Nesker and Kelly know all about being the underdog and barely scraping by to produce their low-budget projects.

Kelly, 39, who has been making films his "entire adult life," said he's been involved in most aspects of movie production including writing, direction, production and financing.

Kelly's latest project, The Seder, is a BravoFact film that he wrote and directed last summer, and which Nesker edited.

"It's about Leo, bringing his boyfriend home for the first time at his family's seder," Kelly said.

He said that he is in the midst of submitting this 17-minute short to a number of film festivals and is waiting to hear back. So far, it's been accepted into the Los Angeles Comedy Festival this year, but it was rejected from the Toronto Jewish Film Festival opening this week.

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

"It'll be really interesting, as a sociological experiment to see what kind of heat The Seder generates at the Jewish film festivals because it will really be a yardstick to measure what the prevailing feeling is towards homosexuality in the Jewish environment," Nesker said.

In addition to working with Kelly on The Seder, Nesker has been busy working on a teaser and "character intros" for a web series he directed called The Undrawn, which "follows the exploits of six ridiculous, drunk, slutty and ineffective superhero bottom feeders at SuperCorp."

"It's the dirtiest thing I've ever been involved with. It's like, a step away from porno, but I think it's pretty fantastic," he said with a grin.

Through Kickstarter, a fundraising platform for creative projects, Nesker and his team managed to raise the required amount to produce the six-episode project.

During the Bootleg festival, Kelly and Nesker, both Toronto-based filmmakers, are eager to present the city as an inviting place to produce film to the many movie makers who will be in town later this month.

"We have an advantage in Toronto in that the requirements to produce original works here aren't necessarily the labyrinthine, bureaucratic messes they are in other places," Nesker said.

"There will be a minimum of 200 people a day coming through the festival and multiple sets of screenings going on throughout the day, events following the screenings at night, events during the day, taking the filmmakers out," Kelly added.

"How often do we get 50 international filmmakers arriving in Toronto at the same time?"

More important for a struggling filmmaker is the opportunity to benefit from meeting others in the industry.

"You'll be networking with like-minded filmmakers who aren't from your own backyard or sphere of influence," Nesker said.

He added that he's confident the young film festival will continue to grow in popularity and influence.

"The track record for Bootleg is pretty damn good. Over three years that the film festival has run, a good chunk have gone on to some measure of success," Nesker said.

"There's definitely a brand that is being established here."

I have a celebrity friend

I don't know if I mentioned it, but I have a celebrity friend. Her name is Alison, and she's on TV! Usually, I'm not impressed by famous people. I'm not going to mention I once saw Michael Bublé on the street and waved to him. I'm not a name-dropper. It's not classy. My friend, Michael Bublé, told me so.

Alison trusts me. I know that, because she always wants me to take care of her granny. Only me. She has millions of friends, yet only I get to take Granny for long, boring walks, listen to her long, boring tales, while Alison's busy having fun with her other friends.

When Alison throws parties, I'm not one of those people who stands besides the wall, watches her for hours, gets closer, touches her and jumps right back. I never do that at her posh parties. Maybe, because I've never been invited to one. Up until last Thursday.

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

When I was invited to one of Alison's parties!

"What will I do when she starts introducing me to all of those hotshots?" I ask Meir as I wrap her super-expensive present.

"Let's cross that imaginary bridge when we get there," says cruel Meir. As he dresses, I wonder if it's time to tell him he wasn't invited.

"I'm not sure that present is appropriate." He looks at the gold earrings with real diamonds.

"I'm not sure, either," I respond. "I'm super sure. You jealous little thing." It's a good thing he's staying home!

When I arrive, I find myself standing alone at the front door. No paparazzi, no nothing. I'm in sort of a panic. I ring the doorbell and put on my most glamorous smile.

One of Alison's employees answers the door. "I'm here for the party. Gosh! Is it not today?" I ask nervously.

"It is. Please walk through the garden to the kitchen entrance," he answers.

As I stumble to the back door, I feel annoying tears starting to fill my eyes, so I hug Alison's earrings and enter.

"Alison will see you in a minute," the worker promises, and my tears vanish.

There she is. Coming down the stairs slowly and majestically. One hand holds the rail, the other holds... Granny.

"So glad you came! My party begins in an hour, so you and Granny should leave before the guests arrive. Granny doesn't like parties and [whispers to me] parties don't like Granny, so take her to the park and be back, say, in four hours?"

Alison notices my fancily wrapped gift. "You brought Granny a gift! You didn't have to. She loves you anyway."

I can't talk yet, so I just mumble "earrings."

Alison throws my wrapped life's saving into a big charity box that stands there. "Nah, she'll try to swallow them, again. Too risky. Now run along, you two!"

After a long, long liberating cry, when I finally take Granny back, I spot Michael Bublé through the back door. I wave and wave, but I'm not really sure he remembers me!

How in control are we really?

We humans aren't really sure if we're running our world well. How would we know? We've never done this before.

Yet, with the advent of such mind-blowing discoveries as cloning and stem cell research, it's as if we've rubbed elbows with God and figured things out. Sometimes we become so cocksure about our achievements, such as the splitting of the atom and the discovery of fish without eyes at the bottom of the sea, that we think we're in charge.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Who needs God at all? Like the people who built the Tower of Babel, our universal confidence, combined with a sense of self-importance, grows so much at these times that we see ourselves as central to existence.

Then what has come to be seen as the inevitable happens. A wave called tsunami washes away eons of children and we are once again pitched back into a reality where we recognize how little control we really have.

Like the wave that arrived irrationally but quite naturally and washed over land in 13 countries in 2004, Breivik's behaviour hints at his being both sane and insane. He gave us no notice of his well-thought-out plans, and even today, makes it impossible for us to define his core motivation for such evil and to see what lies within his soul that allows him to enact a mission contrary to a universal belief in the sacredness of human life.

Breivik makes us quiver and vibrate about our existence because his humanness is so inhumane.

Breivik is a steely character with an Aryan stare, look and demeanour, who spent three years diligently preparing for his crime, right down to a reminder to include bottled water in his backpack on the day of his rampage.

He studied Al Qaeda magazines for their successes and mistakes, and wrote a 1,500-page manifesto on the ills of multiculturalism and the Islamization of Norway. With the assiduousness of Nazi leadership, Breivik masterminded a flawless attack on Oslo and Utoya Island where teenagers affiliated with the country's Labour Party were enjoying the summer.

Was this a regular Norwegian citizen's commitment to his ideology and task at hand, a reflection of his insanity, his psychosis? Or are we to believe when he says, "The worst thing one can do is take a life," that he is sane and indeed recognizes the difference between right and wrong and the illegality of murder?

Are we to trust in the cogency of his mind – compos mentis (literally, a composed mind) – when he tells the court he said to himself just before he started shooting, "I just don't want to do this," and "I knew it was wrong. Taking life is the most extreme action you can do."

Did you know the prophets were considered insane by many because they foretold the future? So who is sane and who is insane? What are we to make of Anders Breivik? How human is he?

What are we to consider when Anders Breivik, like the average German citizen who participated freely and often excitedly in the chilling massacre of children during the Holocaust, appears on the world's radar?

Breivik believed in his ideology. He thought he was right. Are we all from the same human family? How in control are we? When does the wave arrive?

Peres has full slate on Canadian visit

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israeli President Shimon Peres' four-day state visit to Canada began with kind words for the host nation.

In a formal ceremony at Rideau Hall on Monday hosted by Gov.-Gen. David Johnston, Peres thanked Canada on behalf of Israelis.

"I am very, very grateful for your kind invitation to visit your wonderful country," Peres told the Canadian Press. "I have the deepest gratitude, and I bring that gratitude from Jerusalem to Ottawa for the deep friendship that has existed between our peoples from our first day of independence."

This is Peres' first trip to Canada in his capacity as president.

After the formal ceremony, Peres and Johnston held a private meeting focusing on fostering increased collaboration between the two countries in the fields of education and innovation.

He was meeting Prime Minister Stephen Harper on Monday morning as The CJN went to press.

Peres was also scheduled to meet with Opposition leader Thomas Mulcair and interim Liberal party leader Bob Rae while in Ottawa.

On Tuesday, Peres was slated to sign a memorandum of understanding between the Royal Society of Canada and the Israeli Academy of Sciences and Humanities before moving on to a tree-planting at Rideau Hall, the governor general's residence, to commemorate his visit.

On Monday night, Johnston hosted a state dinner in Peres' honour that was attended by Harper and various other dignitaries.

He was also feted by the Jewish community of Canada at a dinner on Tuesday in Ottawa hosted by the Israeli Embassy.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto hosted Peres at a dinner on Wednesday, and another reception by the Jewish community in Montreal was scheduled for Thursday night at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

In addition, Peres was scheduled to meet with Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty on Wednesday to discuss Israeli-Canadian collaboration in the field of brain research.

On Thursday, he was to meet with Quebec Premier Jean Charest before departing for Israel.

Camp Director Dies

MONTREAL — Joe Friedman, for 16 years director at several Jewish community camps during their heyday in the Laurentians, died April 26 at age 86. Between 1960 and 1976, Friedman oversaw camp operations at Camp B'nai Brith, Camp Wooden Acres, the Y Country Camp, and the Laurentian Fresh Air Camp. Friedman then directed services for the elderly at Maimonides Geriatric Centre and Jewish Family Services until his 1995 retirement. Friedman is survived by children David, Matthew, and Elinor and siblings Gersha, Shulom and Ted.

Bezmozgis Wins

TORONTO — Toronto writer and filmmaker David Bezmozgis won the 2011 First Novel Award from Amazon.ca for his book The Free World. The Latvian-born Bezmozgis, 38, who came to Canada with his family in 1980, received the $7,500 prize April 26. The Free World, about three generations of Russian Jews who pursue new lives in the West, was also a finalist for the Governor General's Literary Award and the Giller Prize. Bezmozgis also wrote the 2004 anthology Natasha and Other Stories and wrote and directed the 2009 film Victoria Day.

WORLD

Cdn. Appeals Ruling

NEW YORK — A Jewish Canadian-Egyptian businessman wants a U.S. appeals court to rehear his lawsuit against Coca-Cola for using his family's property in Egypt. Raphael Bigio and his family filed the brief May 2 in New York. He's suing Coca-Cola, headquartered in Atlanta, for its use of family property in Cairo that was confiscated by then-president Gamel Nasser in 1965 during his purges against Egyptian Jews. Bigio hopes to get compensation from the beverage giant for what he alleges is substantial profit. Coca-Cola Egypt leased the property from the family after Nasser's purge. A three-judge panel in New York dismissed the case in March on grounds it didn't contain sufficient evidence Coke caused or directed Coca-Cola Egypt to build additional buildings on the property. Coca-Cola has said that an Egyptian state-owned company, not Coke, owns the property; that it's a minority stakeholder in the firm that leases the land, and that the land was bought from the Egyptian government.

Founder of Peace Studies Slurs Jews

Johan Galtung

OSLO — A Norwegian sociologist who pioneered the discipline of peace studies and conflict resolution made antisemitic and anti-Israel statements in a public lecture and in an article.

Johan Galtung, called the "father of peace studies," also made antisemitic and anti-Israel remarks in an e-mail interview with the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, the newspaper reported.

Galtung claimed there's a possible connection between Anders Behring Breivik, the anti-Muslim Norwegian terrorist who murdered 77 people, mostly children, last summer and Israel's Mossad. He said he believes the Mossad may have given Breivik his orders.

The speech was made last Sept. 30, and a critical article about the speech, as well as several written exchanges between Galtung and the author, were reprinted last week in Norway's Humanist magazine.

Galtung wrote in one of the exchanges, according to Ha'aretz, that Jews control the U.S. media. "Six Jewish companies control 96 per cent of the media," he wrote, naming journalists, publishers, TV networks and movie studios that he claims are controlled by Jews. He also wrote that "70 per cent of the professors at the 20 most important American universities are Jewish."

Galtung recommended that people read the antisemitic screed The Protocols of the Elders of Zion and said that "it is impossible to do so today without thinking of Goldman Sachs," the international investment bank founded by Jews.

United Bakers celebrates 100 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, family owned by the Ladovskys for 100 years, welcomed its fourth generation to the restaurant recently.

Nathan Ladovsky, 22, who recently graduated from Dalhousie University, is working in the kitchen and as a bus boy for the summer.

Whether he joins the business full time is up in the air at the moment, he said.

But he's proud to be part of a tradition that started in 1912, when his great-grandparents, Aaron and Sarah Ladovsky, opened United Bakers as a dairy and pareve restaurant on Agnes Street near Terauley (what is now Dundas near Bay).

To commemorate the 100th anniversary, the Ladovskys are having a "Four days in May" celebration, May 14 to May 17, featuring daily entertainment, music, menu specials, surprises and give-aways during lunch and dinner.

In 1920, after eight years at the original location, the restaurant moved to 338 Spadina Ave., and in 1986, the Ladovskys opened a branch in Lawrence Plaza, at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue. The legendary Spadina location closed two years later.

The gunslinger mentality

Israeli society encourages individualism. For anyone who has ever visited the tiny country, or ever met an Israeli that is like saying the sun comes up every day. It is, rather, stating the obvious.

Asking questions and challenging authority are part of the national character. It is a way of being, a way of finding one's place in the world that is deeply rooted in the intellectual traditions of the people in both its ancient and recent history stemming from Abraham to Moses to the sages whose arguments for the sake of heaven fill the pages of the Talmud.

At the turn of the last century when Jews in increasingly large numbers began finding their way to the mostly hostile terrain of the ancestral homeland, it was usually the hard-driven, self-motivated, undauntable ones of high resolve and daring initiative who stayed on, staking roots into an ever-yielding soil of freedom and independence.

Sixty-four years after the country was established, and more than 100 years after the modern return to Zion began in earnest, the paradigm of the strong, unflinching, tell-it-like-it-is individual still commands respect and praise. There is no retreat for this individual from saying what is on his or her mind, from saying "what needs to be said," from tossing the verbal grenade into the crowded marketplace of public ideas and debate.

Thus we have seen over the last few weeks, the pages, airwaves and blogospheres of Israeli media have veritably spilled over like a cornucopia overflowing a substantial treasure of news coverage of the high-profile individuals who have publicly criticized the prime minister and the defence minister for their views concerning safeguarding the country from the perils of a nuclear Iran.

The highly regarded former head of the Shin Bet (the internal security service), Yuval Diskin, excoriated the government for its Iran policies. In doing so he added his doubts to those of the former head of the Mossad, Meir Dagan, who had already spoken out against the government repeatedly.

Like gunslingers in the old westerns who suddenly show up at the saloon surrounded by shady and untrustworthy characters, they speak their minds, their virtue and courage apparent in their honesty.

But in this case, is their honesty so very virtuous?

The substance of their or any gunslingers' opinions regarding Iran is not the issue. Well-informed, well-intended, reasonable men of common cause and common purpose will always differ on their respective interpretations of facts and possible outcomes. Nor is their right to offer their opinions

At issue is the manner by which they speak, that is, always to the camera but not, where it might be truly more effective, in camera.

For example, Diskin told a receptive media and lay audience at a conference two weeks ago in Kfar Saba, that he could not trust Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak in handling the Iranian crisis due to their "messianism." It was uncertain what he meant by that term in relation to the prime minister and defence minister.

Equally uncertain was the former Shin Bet chief's notion of the rights, freedoms and responsibilities of democratic process. For, along with his florid disparagement of Netanyahu and Barak, Diskin also weighed in against the social justice protesters last summer, whose leaders he said "weren't ready to pay a personal price in order to achieve their goals."

He unfavourably compared the "revolutionists in Rothschild Boulevard and those in Tahrir Square."

"In Tahrir Square, Diskin said, "people paid a price for their principles. If that doesn't happen here, all this social justice thing will be another summer festival in Israel. I think that the people who led it, most of them, aren't really willing to pay a price for it," he said.

What was Diskin implying?

Was he suggesting that unless the Rothschild Boulevard protests led to bloodshed, they were simply playthings, or "festivals," as he unkindly called them, in the minds of the participants and the leaders?

Was he suggesting that the response of the government and the Knesset in appointing the Trachtenberg Committee to study the issues underpinning the Rothschild protests, provide policy guidelines and legislative guidance was inadequate?

And even if the committee and the Knesset ultimately do fail to solve all of the problems, what according to Diskin, in a democratic, civil society that is governed by the rule of law, would have been the proper behaviour by the protesters?

What price was he looking for them to pay to help advance Israeli society?

Not all gunslingers, I suppose, are like Gary Cooper. –*MBD

Audit finds slight decrease in antisemitic incidents

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights reported a slight decrease in antisemitic incidents in 2011.

Altogether, 1,297 occurrences were reported by the League in its 2011 Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, an annual survey of "patterns of prejudice in Canada."

Nearly 41 per cent of the incidents (528) were considered "web-based hate activity," down from the 568 the year before, but substantially higher than the 405 Internet incidents cited in 2008.

Breaking down the incidents by type, the audit found that 916 were cases of harassment (70.7 per cent), 362 were classified as vandalism (27.9 per cent) and 19 were considered instances of violence (1.5 per cent).

Though small in number, the violent episodes were shocking: In Winnipeg, a 15-year-old girl was accosted in a school hallway by a youth uttering anti-Jewish slurs who used a lighter to set her hair on fire. In Montreal, a boy wearing a kippah was swarmed by teens and assaulted. And in Toronto, a man walking home from synagogue was swarmed by teenagers who threw pennies at him and called him "dirty Jew."

While the largest number of incidents was categorized as harassment, even these can be "traumatic" for the victim, said Anita Bromberg, national director of legal affairs for B'nai Brith Canada.

More than 100 harassment incidents included threats of violence, and in many cases, homes were targeted, leaving the occupant feeling very stressed, she said.

Bromberg related an incident recorded in 2009 to illustrate how troubling harassment could be. A young girl, she said, found a swastika on her desk at school. When she came home, she couldn't sleep, and when Bromberg advised her mother to ask the girl what it would take to make her feel comfortable, the daughter asked that the mezuzah, identifying their house as Jewish, be taken down, Bromberg recounted.

The audit suggested the high number of incidents in Canada is part of a growing pattern in the western world.

Levels of antisemitism were high in 2011, "slightly decreasing in some countries, while dramatically increasing in others. But, in total, what these reports have in common is a continuing, steady, global increase in antisemitism in the past decade," the audit stated.

In Canada, the number of incidents reported in annual audits jumped nearly 25 per cent since 2007. In 2001, fewer than 300 incidents were recorded.

Examining "patterns of occurrence," the audit noted that "the largest number of incidents in any month occurred in March, when the so-called Israel Apartheid Week took place on university campuses across the country. Anti-Israel rhetoric spilled over into antisemitic expressions, including harassment, vandalism and assault on campus and elsewhere during this period... In 201 of the 1,297 cases reported, there was a direct link between anti-Israel and antisemitic activity, but the latter, while spurred on by anti-Zionism, was distinctly in and of itself antisemitic in nature."

As for web-based hate, the audit reported, "As in 2010, Jews were blamed for natural disasters, unpopular government policies and the 9/11 attacks, and allegations of government and media control, and organ trafficking continued to be propagated on social networking sites, blogs and websites."

In a section that offered 10 recommendations for action, the audit called for strengthening of the Criminal Code provisions on hate crimes by specifically including Holocaust denial as a prohibited activity. It also called for removing the defence of truth from the hate crimes provision, while "the defence of religious belief should be clarified or repealed."

Bromberg said those steps were recently recommended to a House of Commons justice committee looking at Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act. The section prohibits the dissemination of hate on the Internet or by telephone.

"We understand that Section 13 is going, so if you take Section 13 away, then the Criminal Code will have to fill a gap that is significant in what we've been tracking," she said.

The League for Human Rights also called for banning "hate groups and the symbols they use to advance their racist agenda."

It also advocated "zero tolerance for hate, from educators at elementary and high schools, and campus administrators, to human rights commissions, police and government. Public education is the key to the success of such an approach."

Shimon Ben Yaacov completed his services in the Golani Special Forces Platoon. His devotion to Israel inspired him to sign up for another year in the elite "Shaldag" unit (Special Surface-Air Designation Team).

On the fifth day of the first Lebanon war in 1982, word reached Shimon's unit that two officers had been captured by terrorists and were being held in a building near Docha.

Shimon was part of a three-man group going in under fire to rescue the officers. Once they reached the building, a grenade was thrown from inside. This left Shimon wounded.

"I felt a burning sensation in my arm and thigh. Although I was bleeding, I felt numb and went on fighting. All that I could think of was to save my comrades and complete our mission."

Unfortunately the situation worsened. A terrorist thrust the barrel of his gun through a window and mercilessly sprayed Shimon with bullets causing severe damage to his leg.

Shimon was eventually rescued and spent nine long months in hospital. Despite the severity of his injuries, the doctors were able to save his leg from amputation. However, he has no knee joint and is unable to bend his leg.

"As soon as I was released from hospital, I came to Tel Aviv's Beit Halochem Centre where I joined the swimming team, played badminton and had physiotherapy."

In 2002 Shimon learned about a Beit Halochem sailing group at the Tel Aviv marina. It excited him tremendously as he had been a competitive sailor prior to joining the army.

Since his injuries, Shimon never thought that he would be back in a sailboat again. Thanks to Beit Halochem, he is currently training for the 2012 Paralympic Games in London, England.

Binding contract means cell towers will stay

Rogers insists radiation levels are safe

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Despite a backlash from local Jewish residents, Aish HaTorah Toronto says that a binding contract it signed allowing Rogers Communications to install cellphone towers atop Aish's Thornhill community centre means the structures are here to stay.

Aish Toronto agreed to let Rogers erect nine towers on the roof of its Clark Avenue low-rise building – which is home to a synagogue and Gan Nitzanim, a nursery school – in exchange for a monthly payment of $1,500.

But some Jewish community members have demanded that Aish walk away from the deal, citing potential health risks from radiation emitted by the towers, as well as a possible decline in property values of homes in the area.

Local residents expressed their anger at a public meeting in late March, and Gan parents had their own meeting with Aish officials around the same time.

In response to pressure to cancel the deal, Aish Toronto spokesperson Caroline Spivak said Aish leaders consulted lawyers about their options.

"We committed to the community to try to delay the testing and operation of the towers, but Rogers flat out said no," Spivak said.

"We engaged legal council to help us understand if there was an opportunity to challenge the contract. There is not," she said. "Rogers is not in breach of their contractual obligation, and as a result, Aish is expected to uphold and maintain its own contractual obligations. As far as Rogers is concerned, they're not coming down."

Spivak said that if Aish tried to back out of the contract, "it would ruin Aish Toronto. You have to appreciate a big, global company like that can out-resource a community centre… Are they going to feel sorry for us because our community isn't happy? No. They're in the business of making money."

Although the contract was signed in June 2011, it wasn't until construction began this past January that people learned about the decision.

Thornhill resident and Gan Nitzanim parent Aaron Posner said no one at Aish informed the community or the building's tenants about the deal.

"No one knew what was going on until [the towers] were up. We came in one morning and there they were," Posner said.

Posner said as soon as he learned about the towers, he began to do some research on the Internet about the effects their electromagnetic waves can have on a person's health.

"There were a billion articles – half saying it's fine, half saying it's not fine. And that's just not good enough," he said.

"Countries develop their policies on cellphone towers and the health risks associated with them based on a World Health Organization report written in 2006… That report was updated in 2009… That is so long ago when it comes to technology that it's almost not worthwhile talking about."

He said the WHO now plans to revisit the issue with a new report this year.

"Until you do a 20-year study and have children under the age of four exposed to it eight hours a day, five days a week, then you'll have a study," he said.

Rogers spokesperson Leigh-Ann Popek insisted that the towers' radiation emission levels are well below government health limits. "When building or upgrading infrastructure, we are always in compliance with Health Canada standards, Industry Canada regulations, and the processes and regulations of the local municipality," she said.

Popek said the towers are in the final phases of construction. They need to be tested and are expected to be activated by the end of the year.

Spivak admitted that it was wrong of Aish leaders not to consult the community before the contract was signed.

"That is something that Aish Toronto recognizes – that while it wasn't a legal or procedural requirement, it would have been a good neighbourly [action]," Spivak said.

"It was an honest oversight. Certainly, there was no anticipation of the intense backlash that has been received. [Aish leaders] thought they were doing a good thing for the community in order to use the funds to support ongoing programming, but they didn't consult, and that has been fully acknowledged by Aish.

"Unfortunately, many in the community are not willing to accept that it was an honest-to-goodness mistake. There was no deliberate deceit here on the part of anyone."

Spivak added that cell towers are more prevalent in our communities than most people realize and emit less radiation than personal mobile devices.

"Whether we see them or not, they're everywhere in our community. There's more radiation coming out of a cellphone that a parent is talking on while driving their child to a daycare than there is from the proximity to the cellphone towers."

Gan Nitzanim director Naomi Zipori said she's currently looking for a new location for her school, which serves more than 90 children between the ages of two and five.

Zipori said she's in a bidding war for an undisclosed location, but likely won't know whether she's won the bid until the end of this month.

"Now the parents are very scared about what's going on next year," she said. "They want to stay, but still they're worried about the space."

But Zipori said that if she loses the bid for a new location, she'll stay at Aish.

"I don't think it's such a big deal, because the towers are all over Toronto. All over. I checked. It's terrible. If not here, then somewhere else," she said.

Posner, who has one child currently attending the nursery and plans to send his twins there next year, said if the school doesn't move to another location, he doesn't know what he'll do.

"I have no plan B," he said.

Posner agreed that legally, Rogers isn't doing anything wrong, but he cited Industry Canada guidelines that state companies should consider "local circumstances" when choosing a site.

"We value community feedback and we consider the needs of local residents when constructing the infrastructure that provides wireless service to customers and communities throughout the country," Popek said.

"We work hard to find a suitable location and design while still meeting the technical requirements of the network."

But Posner said Rogers is just paying lip service to community concerns.

"How can you say you considered this when you put it on top of a school, on a shul, and worse, next door to the Reena centre?" he said, referring to Reena's Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre for adults with developmental disabilities.

"We can't sue Rogers… but I think they're wrong, and I think the reason they'll never back down is because it'll set a precedent if they back down," he added.

When asked what actions Rogers would take if Aish decided to walk away from the contract, Popek wouldn't comment, saying that the agreement between Rogers and Aish "is privileged information."

Two Yom Ha'atzmaut events fill the air with pride and ruach

By Daniel Horowitz On Yom Ha'atzmaut, students from three UJA-affiliated Jewish Schools celebrated together, including a joint singing of Hatikvah with a Jewish school in Brazil, via Skype

While Jewish communities around the world celebrated Israel's 64th anniversary on April 26th, two festive birthday parties in honour of the Jewish State took place just north of Jewish Toronto, in York Region.

And, considering that today there are approximately 80,000 Jews living north of Steeles Avenue, and that it's the fastest growing Jewish community outside of Israel, it was the perfect place to celebrate.

Braving unseasonably cold and windy conditions, three UJA Federation-affiliated schools that sit side-by-side along the Atkinson Avenue Corridor - The North Campus of The Leo Baeck Day School, Netivot Hatorah Day School and Associated Hebrew Schools Kamin Education Centre - all came together to participate in their annual festive and inspirational Yom Ha'atzmaut parade.

The three schools closed their doors for a few hours as

Atkinson Avenue was transformed into a sea of blue and white, lined with cheering younger students proudly waving Israeli flags and raising their voices, together in song.

"I felt really happy during the walk and about Israel turning 64," explained Grade 4 Leo Baeck Day School student, Laila Bloomstone. "I thought about Herzel and how even before the war he wanted the Jews to have a Jewish State and today we are celebrating 64 years since Israel was established."

One of the highlights of the celebration took place when the students reached Associated Hebrew Schools Kamin Education Centre where they sang Hatikvah together with a Jewish school from Brazil, via Skype.

"I felt so excited to be walking along Atkinson Avenue with my Netivot students waving flags and singing songs," said Calanit Turgeman, a Grade 5 teacher at Netivot HaTorah. "I am from Israel, and even though I am abroad, I felt so proud to be a part of this special nation - Am Israel."

"The parade is a wonderful and integral part of Netivot HaTorah's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration," explained TK Rosenblum, a parent volunteer. "The students and parents all look forward to being part of this exciting event. The opportunity for me to walk hand-in-hand with my children in support of Israel and to stand united as a community with hundreds of children from different Jewish backgrounds in a show of solidarity to Israel, is not only incredible to witness but is amazing to be a part of."

"It made me feel proud because we were helping to support and care for Israel," said Adam Zoltak, a Grade 4 student at Associated Hebrew Schools Kamin Education Centre.

"It was fun because we were with the other Jewish schools celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut together," said Maggie Rappaport, a Grade 5 student at Associated Hebrew Schools Kamin Education Centre.

"I looked in front of me and saw so many people cheering," said Adam Freedman, a Grade 4 student at Leo Baeck Day School. "This felt like we were in Israel and made me proud to be Jewish."

Meanwhile, at the intersection of Lebovic Campus Drive and Ilan Ramon Blvd., over one thousand community members came out to celebrate Israel's birthday at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

Young families and children were entertained by jugglers, magicians, face-painters and uplifting Israeli music led by the Magen Boys. A varied array of kosher food and drinks kept the crowds energetic and ready to celebrate.

"It's a little cold," Ellie Horowitz said, "but our feelings for Israel are warm and constant, and my family wouldn't miss celebrating Israel's birthday for anything."

The celebration, organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, concluded with live music by the Elevation Band which had community members dancing and singing until nightfall.

"As Jewish life north of Steeles continues to grow and flourish at an incredible clip, it stands to reason that celebrating Jewish life and Israel's 64th anniversary would take to the streets of York Region," said Ted Sokolsky, UJA Federation President & CEO. "I am proud and delighted to see our schools come together as one to honour the Jewish State's anniversary with its annual walk along Atkinson Avenue, where these beautiful children show their love for Israel. And, to see so many members of the community come out to our celebration on the Lebovic Campus, fittingly at the corner of Lebovic and Ilan Ramon Blvd., illustrates the vibrancy and growth of Jewish life to the north."

The near-nonogenarian is one of the most recognized and highly regarded individuals in the world. Distinguished by his frothy mane of carefully combed, silver-white hair, his sonorous baritone voice, his charming, warm, broad smile, his ability to condense experience into wisdom and wisdom into aphorism, when he speaks, others listen.

This week, many Canadians will have heard Shimon Peres speak and will have undoubtedly marvelled at the clearly envisioned and carefully drawn horizon of hope and possibility that he envisions for Israel, the Middle East and all humankind.

Since Sunday, the president of the State of Israel has been on a five-day state visit to Canada, received by Canada's head of state, its head of government and myriad government, parliamentary, community and other officials and lay leaders with the enthusiasm and warmth indicative of the profound respect for the distinguished visitor personally, and of the deep friendship for the tiny, remarkable country that he represents.

And it is indeed an extraordinary friendship anchored in the single-most important and precious value on God's earth: cherishing, nurturing, saving and protecting each and every human life. It is this value that provides the bedrock core of democracy. And it is this foundation of democracy, common to both Canada and Israel, that ties the two countries together in an iron and steel ribbon of life-affirming purpose that must stand for all time.

Among the official duties to which Peres is attending during his visit is the signing of a memorandum of understanding between the Royal Society of Canada and the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities. There is no doubt, however, that this ceremony was less duty and more pleasure for Peres. He is and has always been a stalwart champion of education and science as the key methods for building bridges of peace across the wide, scarred crevasses of conflict and distrust.

At a hopeful gathering of foreign leaders at Sharm el-Sheikh, on March 13, 1996, then-prime minister Peres said: "Let us all unite to wipe out the curse of terror and to receive the blessing of peace. Let your children and our children know a future of peace. Let them march, safe and sound, through the gates of the next century, free of fear, equipped with knowledge and wisdom, into a new era for mankind."

The building of this new era, an era of peace and prosperity for all mankind has been the one recurring theme of Shimon Peres' life, to which he has committed all his strength, all his will, all his courage, his prayers and his deeds.

Welcome to Canada President Peres. May God crown your deeds with success.

Israeli settlements (1)

Many Jews on the so-called left want the settlement project stopped, knowing full well that peace will not miraculously follow but for several other important reasons. First, it will help shift the focus and pressure to the real problem – Palestinian intransigence and opposition to accepting a Jewish state. More importantly, it will create what the security fence was initially intended to do when it was first proposed by Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin – separation of Israel from the Palestinian territories. This important objective is being undermined by Jewish settlements in the midst of large Arab populations that are not only an enormous economic and security burden, but also create an ongoing irritant that exacerbates Arab and international antipathy toward Israel. It will take decades, if ever, before the majority of Arabs will accept a Jewish state. In the meantime, as much as possible, we need to get out of each others' lives.

Israeli settlements (2)

The suggestion in Tamara Micner's letter, "Leave vengeance to a higher power" (April 19), that more than 300,000 Jewish Israelis living in the West Bank should see their settlements dismantled is ludicrous. Apart from the fact that there is no legal or moral reason why they should not remain there, is the writer proposing that, at tremendous financial costs, they should be relocated to some other part of Israel and then, as was done when Gaza was vacated by Jewish settlers, the Palestinians will come in and destroy the houses in the West Bank? Perhaps as an alternative resolution, rather than being sent to some other part of Israel, the settlers would be sent back to Arab lands where their forefathers were forced out with the creation of the State of Israel. Somehow, the letter writer equates the presence of Jewish settlers in the West Bank with an act of vengeance and cites the golden rule as a formula for Israel's treatment of the Palestinians. Before the Israelis are taken to task for their treatment of Arabs, Micner should encourage every Arab country to apply the golden rule to the treatment of its own citizens.

The role of rabbis

We concur with Rabbi Dow Marmur's analysis of the changing view of the modern rabbi from a purveyor of Jewish scholarship, whose primary task is to inculcate a sense of holiness in his congregants, to counsellor, fundraiser and promoter ("Rabbis then and now," March 29). We feel less enthusiastic about Rabbi Marmur's tolerance of the new type of "democratic nature of contemporary religious life that seeks to reach out and connect with individuals and thus find the presence of God." It seems that people often want a synagogue to be a kind of country club rather than a way to connect with God through each other.

How can a rabbi connect his congregants with the God of Israel and His demands of us without directing them to the ancient intellectual heritage that contains the guidelines for leading a truly Jewish life? And of what relevance is the title "rabbi" (i.e., teacher) for a leader who is not a teacher? Ironically, such congregations resemble closely the Hellenized Jews of the early second century BCE who sought to turn the Temple into a place of money-making and secularization.

Bible contest winner's name omitted

Your front-page story, "Bible mavens tested on Yom Ha'atzmaut" (May 3), correctly gave credit to Canadian teenage finalists Aaron Goldberg of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, who tied for first place among Diaspora contestants, and Charlie Friedman of Hebrew Academy in Montreal for their participation in the International Bible Contest. But there was a third Canadian student, Jordana Maged, also of TanenbaumCHAT, in the finals. She placed 10th worldwide. TanenbaumCHAT is very proud of the fact that this is the fifth successive year that one or more of our students has qualified for the Jerusalem finals of the International Bible Contest (Chidon Hatanach), a record that we believe is unequalled by any other Diaspora Jewish school.

Benjamin Netanyahu's political inheritance

Yossi Klein Halevi

Benzion Netanyahu, scholar of the Inquisition, secretary to Ze'ev Jabotinsky, and father of Benjamin, was the last of the purist Revisionist Zionists. He carried Revisionism's bitter battles against the Zionist left to the end of his 102 years. And his complicated relationship with his son tells the story of the successes and failures of the Revisionist movement.

Through the 1930s and '40s, Revisionist and left-wing Zionists argued vehemently about the nature of the future state and how to create it. Labor Zionists were socialists. Revisionists capitalists. Labor co-operated with the British mandate; the Revisionists revolted. And Labor accepted the division of the Land of Israel, while Revisionists opposed every partition plan, including the first partition in 1922, which created the Kingdom of Jordan. The future state, argued Jabotinsky, would need ample borders in which to accommodate millions of future Jewish immigrants from eastern Europe.

The most profound debate between Revisionism and Labor concerned the nature of the Zionist transformation of the Jew. All Zionists agreed that the Jewish character had been distorted by exile; the question was what aspects of that personality needed to be changed. Labor advocated a total overhaul: a secular socialist Jew, freed of piety and economic marginality, a farmer and a worker. Revisionism, though, had only one demand on the new Jew: become a soldier. Jabotinsky didn't care whether Jews were Orthodox or atheist, workers or businessmen – so long as they knew how to defend themselves.

A key component to self-defence is the ability to perceive threat. And with the rise of Nazism, Revisionism's insistence on Jewish power became a war against Jewish complacency and self-delusion. In speeches across eastern Europe, Jabotinsky urged young Jews to learn to shoot and prepare to get out. "Es brent a fire," he warned, a fire is burning. Destroy the exile before the exile destroys you. Jabotinsky's opponents mocked him as a fear-monger.

Of all the divides separating Revisionism and Labor, the failure of the mainstream Zionist movement to sense the approaching abyss and attempt to rescue Europe's Jews remained perhaps the most bitter. Zionism, the antidote to Jewish wishful thinking, had, under Labor, been guilty of that worst Diaspora character flaw, and at the worst moment in Jewish history.

In the early years of the state, all that seemed left for Revisionism to fight over was the past. Revisionism's most passionate issue became opposition to German reparations. The fight over partition, after all, had apparently been resolved in Labor's favor. Revisionists kept the memory of both banks of the Jordan alive more as nostalgia than realistic platform. They sang the anthem, "Both banks of the Jordan/ this one is ours, the other too," and members of Betar, the Revisionist youth movement, wore on their navy blue uniforms a patch of the old dream map, of both banks of the Jordan. This wasn't a map of Israel's future, but a memory of what could have been had the Jews listened to Jabotinsky, the borders of thwarted rescue.

What Revisionism retained most urgently wasn't so much ideology but sensibility. Jewish naivete, Revisionists insisted, had been the indispensable partner of the Final Solution. That is what kept the victims from listening to Jabotinsky and fleeing in time. The Nazis played on Jewish hope, reassuring their victims through a series of linguistic deceptions that ended with the showers. What remained of Revisionism was its 11th commandment: don't be a fool.

Then came the Six Day War. Suddenly territorial maximalism was relevant again. The new 1967 borders weren't the same borders Revisionists had dreamed of, but they were close enough. History had compensated the Jews for its territorial losses. Not one inch, vowed Jabotinsky's heir, Menachem Begin.

Ten years later, in 1977, came the moment the Revisionists had longed for and almost despaired would ever come. After 29 years in opposition – along with two decades in opposition before statehood –Begin finally rose to power.

And then, almost immediately, came the shattering. When Begin agreed to cede all of Sinai in exchange for peace with Egypt, one of his strongest critics from the right was Benzion Netanyahu. Yet Begin understood what the right-wing academic did not: that the actual wielding of power brought responsibility, a choice between values. Given the possibility of neutralizing the enmity of Israel's most powerful neighbour, Begin opted for peace over land. For Benzion, though, power remained abstract, and ideology absolute.

But the cruelest blow to Benzion came from his son. A political rift between them opened during the election campaign of 1996, when Bibi declared that he would accept the Oslo accords, while insisting on Palestinian reciprocity. Benzion was outraged. Benjamin tried to explain that his endorsement of Oslo was only tactical. Benzion countered: what begins as tactical ends in a betrayal of principle.

Benzion was right. In his second term, Bibi became the first Likud leader to accept the principle of a two-state solution, the possible withdrawal from the second bank of the Jordan. While most of the international community missed the significance of Bibi's historic concession, his father surely did not. Under Prime Minister Netanyahu, Revisionist ideology was buried in a state funeral. Yet even as he rejected the practicality of his father's territorial maximalism, Bibi remained faithful to his father's sensibility.

What Aharon Appelfeld has done in fiction, Benzion Netanyahu did in scholarship: dissect the consequences of Jewish naivete. Benzion's fascination with medieval Spain wasn't based only on the behaviour of the victimizers but of the victims. He not only drew a line connecting what he defined as the racial antisemitism of the Inquisition with Nazism, but implicitly drew a line between the Jews who saw medieval Spain as their golden land and the Jews who saw modern Germany as their new Zion.

It is precisely that dread of Jewish self-deception that has defined the politics of Benzion's son. Don't believe the Palestinian leaders when they speak about peace in English and jihad in Arabic, Prime Minister Netanyahu warned in his first term. And do believe the mullahs when they threaten to destroy the Jewish state, he now warns in his second term.

The war between the heirs of Labor and the heirs of Revisionism is no longer over ideology, but sensibility. Labor won the debate over partition: a strong majority of Israelis backs a two-state solution. Yet that same majority wants the Labor ideology of partition to be implemented by the Revisionist sensibility of wariness. And that is what Benzion's son has committed himself to do. Not to preserve greater Israel at all cost, but to negotiate a safe partition if that becomes possible. A partition without wishful thinking.

Prime Minister Netanyahu has forever changed Israel's political map and, in so doing, helped prepare the way for an eventual agreement with the Palestinians. That is not the victory Benzion hoped for. But it is, in its painful way, a vindication of the politics of realism he taught his son.

IDF lawyers act with integrity in West Bank

We're in the midst of another series of worrying occurrences in the West Bank, at least if you're concerned about the rule of law in those parts – to paraphrase the title of Ra'anan Alexandrowicz's award-winning documentary The Law in These Parts, released last summer. It examines the role of IDF judges and legal advisers in the now 45-year-old Israeli occupation of Judea and Samaria.

Having served as the IDF legal adviser to the West Bank and having spent most of my professional career addressing the legalities of myriad issues, large and small, pertaining to the IDF's military governance of this area, I dispute Alexandrowicz's underlying premise, expressed when accepting a prize at this year's Sundance Film Festival. He noted that "what you find out in the film... is that upholding law doesn't always lead to justice. It can even be used as a tool against certain segments of society. We have to oppose them, and if necessary, we have to break them."

I argued against these hypotheses as well as the manner in which the film was made when I debated Alexandrowicz after a screening of his film in Tel Aviv several months ago.

IDF lawyers, particularly those serving in the West Bank, often face complex dilemmas. My experience is that they do so with legal, ethical and moral integrity, understanding that the law, international or domestic, governs and not the whims or desires of other players in the field. And there are many players – left and right: Israelis, Palestinians and assorted foreigners; politicians and bureaucrats; military commanders and civilians.

Examples abound of recent West Bank events, loaded with legalities, requiring adroit legal attention from IDF lawyers, not to mention nerves of steel and a very sturdy backbone.

Yair Lootsteen

in Jerusalem

Just before Passover, settlers invaded a house in a Palestinian neighbourhood of Hebron, claiming they had circuitously purchased the property from its original Palestinian owner. Government ministers and assorted politicians flocked to this new Jewish enclave.

IDF lawyers examined the situation and concluded the settlers should be evicted to allow appropriate scrutiny of the conveyance contract, but mostly because they hadn't received a permit necessary to complete the transaction, requiring prior ministerial approval for such deals to ensure the government – and not settlers – decide if, where and when to expand existing Jewish presence in the West Bank.

IDF lawyers will also be deciding whether to indict Lt.-Col. Shalom Eisner, deputy commander of the Jordan Valley Brigade, who struck a Danish pro-Palestinian supporter in the face with his assault rifle the day after Passover, because the Dane and other Palestinian and foreign activists refused to disperse a protest by cyclists.

The most sensitive matters presently being dealt with by military attorneys serving in Judea and Samaria relate to the fate of several unauthorized and illegal outposts and neighbourhoods in different locales around the West Bank. Tens are scattered all over the territory, but the most overtly illegal are those built on land owned privately by Palestinians.

In the past few years, Palestinian land owners, represented by Israeli lawyers, have petitioned the Supreme Court demanding that the West Bank military government dismantle settler construction erected on their land. In several cases, the state has been ordered to destroy these structures.

The current hotspots are Migron, an illegal outpost housing more than 50 families, and Givat HaUlpana, a neighbourhood of Bet El with thirty families of its own. The Supreme Court set dates by which the buildings in both spots must be dismantled or destroyed, but politicians and military commanders want delays, arguing that destruction will lead to explosive circumstances.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's coalition is threatened by the prospect of demolition, and commanders fear settler violence. Government lawyers asked for long extensions on the court's orders, but got less. Migron is to be dismantled by Aug. 1, and the government was given only two months to explain how and when it plans to destroy the Ulpana neighbourhood.

Cases such as Migron and Ulpana put legal advisers in uncomfortable positions. Their "clients" don't like their advice, not understanding the different allegiances government and private lawyers have – one to the law, the other to their clients.

West Bank legal advisers often find themselves being lambasted from the left by people like Alexandrowicz and from the right by settlers and their supporters.

This criticism always made me feel that I was probably doing an effective job.

Why Israelis are (relatively) happy

In an international survey commissioned by the United Nations and published by Columbia University, Israel was ranked as the 14th "happiest" country in the world. The survey – based on factors such as health, family and job security, and social factors such as political freedom, social networks and lack of government corruption, is no fluke, and it's backed up by the behaviour of millions of Israelis.

Anyone participating in the Independence Day festivities in parks and nature trails would see that Israelis are very satisfied with their lot and achievements. Yes, we like to complain and criticize (these are Jewish national sports), and yes, there are plenty of dangers, but the bottom line is that most Israelis lead rewarding lives.

In contrast, if you read the newspapers or view news reports from most other media, Israel would appear to be a depressing and foreboding place to live. Even some major Jewish groups emphasize and greatly exaggerate the difficulties and confrontations that characterize life in the Jewish nation state, usually finding some alienated Israelis to provide authenticity.

Looking outward, for each of its 64 years of independence, Israel has been portrayed as facing imminent destruction, most recently from Iran and its allies such as Hezbollah and Hamas. In this, our political leaders are responsible for overstating the country's vulnerability, but Israelis have learned to filter out the hyperbole and live with the uncertainty.

In parallel, latter-day Jewish prophets of doom and gloom, viewing Israel from computer screens and short visits, such as former New Republic editor Peter Beinart, have risen to fame by predicting that the unresolved Palestinian conflict is certain to bring destruction. In contrast, the majority of Israelis who live with the reality on a daily basis know that there are no realistic solutions on the horizon. Certainly, Israel's geopolitical situation is more precarious than countries with higher happiness ratings (Canada is fifth), but, as the popular song goes, we have no other Jewish homeland, and we're making a reasonable go of it.

Indeed, the fact that we live in the Land of Israel, the homeland of the Jewish people, as a free and sovereign nation for the first time in 2,000 years is what this is all about – this gives life meaning for many of Israel's seven million Jewish citizens. We have our differences, but this is only natural as we attempt to weave numerous diverse and strongly held beliefs into a coherent social fabric.

These differences are greatly exaggerated when they're portrayed by "mainstream" writers who specialize in uninformed criticism. Some Jewish groups competing for funds, attention and influence join in by painting a highly negative image of Israel. In these public relations battles, Israeli society is falsely portrayed as "anti-democratic", and dominated by "extremists" – totally distorting a complex struggle between strongly held traditions and interests.

For example, isolated incidents in which women were attacked by a tiny fringe in a Beit Shemesh turf battle – and which were clearly not ignored – were falsely turned into images representative of the entire society. And the head of one major Jewish organization even used the odious comparison of Israel to Iran in appealing for funds. Fringes cynically use exaggerated threats from other extremes to promote their own interests.

In contrast, Israel has done and is still doing an amazing job of integrating millions of immigrants from many different backgrounds. We have revived Jewish culture in a renaissance of learning and art that is unprecedented, including the regeneration of the Hebrew language, allowing everyone access to texts ranging from the original Bible to modern debates on philosophy and politics.

If Israel were really such a desolate and troubled place to live, the rankings on "happiness" surveys would be much lower, and a much larger number of talented Israelis would be leaving. At the same time, we know that our society is far from perfect (no place is), and we have our share of problems and challenges, both internally and externally.

But negative campaigning and gratuitous Israel bashing is counterproductive to efforts to overcome these challenges.

West Bank outposts trigger tension

On April 24, the Israeli government retroactively legalized three unauthorized Jewish outposts in the West Bank, touching off a firestorm of international criticism and focusing attention yet again on Israel's controversial settlement building program in the territories.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's spokesperson, Mark Regev, blandly downplayed the legalization of Bruchin, Sansana and Rechelim, populated by 188 families, as merely a procedural matter of no real importance.

But Regev's assessment was hotly disputed.

The secretary general of the United Nations, Ban Ki-moon, called the legalization contrary to Israeli law and Israel's obligation under the 2003 "road map" peace plan. The foreign minister of the European Union, Catherine Ashton, said that settlements are illegal under international law, pose an obstacle to the attainment of peace and threaten "the viability of a two-state solution."

The U.S. State Department described the legalization as unhelpful and noted that the United States does not accept "the legitimacy of continued settlement activity."

Saeb Erekat, a senior Palestinian Authority official, said that Israel's settlement policy would destroy the two-state solution and what is still left of the peace process. The PA's observer at the United Nations, Riyad Mansour, claimed that Israel's aim is to entrench its "massive network of illegal settlements." He urged the Security Council to address the issue.

Israel's decision was announced about a month after the Israeli Supreme Court ordered the West Bank outpost of Migron to be dismantled by Aug. 1 and a year after the Israeli government decided that outposts built on state land would be legalized, while those on private Palestinian land would be removed.

The court's verdict shines a spotlight on Israel's archipelago of about 100 unauthorized outposts. Israel makes a distinction between these outposts, some of which have been erected on private Palestinian land, and the 121 settlements that have been constructed with the government's approval since the 1967 Six Day War.

The outposts were established at the instigation of Ariel Sharon, long a champion and enabler of settlements.

In 1998, when he was defence minister in Netanyahu's first government, he urged Jewish settlers to seize hilltops in the West Bank so as to break up the contiguity of Palestinian-inhabited areas and prevent the creation of a contiguous Palestinian state.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A succession of Israeli prime ministers, including Sharon, promised to dismantle the outposts, which were built by highly ideological settlers without the permission of the government and in violation of Israeli Supreme Court veredicts.

On March 8, 2005, two months after Sharon succumbed to a massive stroke that incapacitated him, the Israeli government released an official report on the outposts written by Talia Sasson, a lawyer in the State's Attorney office.

The report was explosive in terms of its content and its implications.

Sasson concluded that Israeli state bodies, from the defence to the housing ministry, had been discreetly diverting huge sums of money to the outposts and the settlements.

She charged that the ministry of housing had supplied 400 mobile homes, while the ministry of education and the ministry of energy had respectively paid for nurseries and teachers and hookups to the electricity grid.

Calling the diversions a "blatant violation of the law," she recommended that "drastic steps" be taken to rectify the situation, such as stripping the ministry of housing of authority over the construction of settlements and transferring that authority to the cabinet.

And in an unmistakable message, Sasson declared that Israel should cease speaking in "two voices" over the issue: "The government must take into its hands responsibility for what is happening in the outposts... and not sit on the sidelines watching as the settlers do whatever they want, without anyone stopping them."

Ariel Sharon

Less than a week after the publication of the report, the government, led by Sharon's successor, Ehud Olmert, voted by a margin of 18-1 to approve Sasson's recommendations. The then minister of housing, Isaac Herzog, promised to study the report and implement its recommendations.

Seven years on, however, the report has been virtually forgotten, its recommendations having been all but ignored.

Israel has razed a few unauthorized outposts, including Amona, Mitzpe Avichal and Maoz Esther, but some have been rebuilt by recalcitrant settlers, whose attitude toward the rule of law is nothing less than flippant.

Talia Sasson

Bitter by the fact that her report has been left to gather dust, Sasson, in a recent interview with the Times of Israel website, accused Netanyahu of destroying Israel's democratic and Jewish future by undertaking massive and indiscriminate settlement expansion.

She scathingly dismissed Netanyahu's formal endorsement of Palestinian statehood as "meaningless" and "empty" words.

Facing a severe backlash from cabinet colleagues and pro-settlement movements, Netanyahu said last month, "The principle that has guided me is to strengthen Jewish communities in Judea and Samaria."

Quite true.

Last November, in a move designed to punish the PA for its "unilateral manoeuvre" to join UNESCO, a United Nations agency, Netanyahu announced a new wave of settlement construction in the West Bank and in eastern Jerusalem, both of which are sought by the PA for a Palestinian state.

Netanyahu's office disclosed that some 2,000 housing units would be built in Gush Etzion and Ma'aleh Adumim and in eastern Jerusalem's Har Homa district, noting that these areas would remain in Israel's hands "under any future peace agreement."

More recently, Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz and Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz said that settlement construction is an intrinsic component of government policy.

Steinitz disclosed that government assistance to settlements in the West Bank has risen of late, saying that settlers who had submitted to a 10-month partial settlement freeze in 2010 should be compensated. Katz asserted that a Likud government "ought to be encouraging settlement."

Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, a settler himself, went one step further, warning that Netanyahu's coalition government would unravel should the unauthorized outposts of Migron and Givat Assaf be demolished.

With an early national election looming on the horizon, Netanyahu is scrambling to save the outposts, even if they push Israel into further confrontations with the Palestinians and the international community.

Netanyahu not committed to two states: Peace Now

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has no interest in reaching a peace agreement with the Palestinian Authority, says the director general of Peace Now.

"Netanyahu doesn't feel committed to the two-state solution," Yariv Oppenheimer asserted in an interview last week. "He's not serious about it."

"The current government is not one to make peace with the Palestinians," he added, echoing a recent comment by the former head of the Shin Bet, Yuval Diskin.

Speaking at a conference last month on the Arab-Israeli conflict, Diskin said, "We are not talking to the Palestinians because this government has no interest in negotiations... This government is not interested in solving anything with the Palestinians, and I say this with certainty."

Comparing Netanyahu to one of his Likud predecessors, Yitzhak Shamir, Oppenheimer said, "He's becoming a modern version of Shamir, saying, 'No, no, no' to everything."

In a reference to Netanyahu's settlement expansion policy in the West Bank, he noted, "He's interested in creating facts on the ground."

Oppenheimer, who was in Toronto to deliver a lecture sponsored by Canadian

Yariv Oppenheimer

Friends of Peace Now, said Israel should have imposed a freeze on the construction of settlements in the West Bank right after the 1967 Six Day War.

In his view, settlements were built with one purpose in mind: to prevent the emergence of a geographically contiguous Palestinian state.

Suggesting that Netanyahu's formal acceptance of a two-state solution in 2009 was insincere and should not be taken at face value, Oppenheimer said, "He was under pressure from the Israeli public to show leadership after he became prime minister."

Netanyahu's coalition government would break up if he agreed to participate in substantive negotiations with the Palestinians, he said. "For Netanyahu, photo-ops are more important than real negotiations."

Oppenheimer charged that Netanyahu is using the demand for Palestinian recognition of Israel as a Jewish state as an excuse to let the status quo stand.

"Israel should be a Jewish state, but as an Israeli, I don't need the Palestinian Authority to define Israel's character."

Oppenheimer said that Israel can only preserve its status as a Jewish democratic state by ending its four-decade occupation of the West Bank.

Despite his belief that prospects for a peace accord are currently dim, he urged Israel's peace camp to persevere and not succumb to despair.

"Maybe it will take 10 to 15 years, but we have to continue to fight for peace. It's still possible, even if it's painful and traumatic. The two-state solution is not dead. Eventually, Israel will have to confront the issue of the West Bank."

Oppenheimer described the PA as a "credible partner" whose goal is to reach a peace agreement with Israel, saying its leadership of President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Salam Fayyad is "more moderate" than was former PA president Yasser Arafat.

Rather than advocating violence, an old Palestinian tactic, they call for non-violent resistance to Israel's occupation of the West Bank so as to create conditions for statehood, he said.

Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel, as well as the lack of mutual trust between Israel and the PA, are further obstacles in the way of peace, he observed.

A peace accord would garner international support for Israel and undermine Iran's rationale for being at war with the Jewish state, Oppenheimer argued.

Rather than being an Israeli issue, Iran's nuclear program is really a matter for the international community to resolve, he said. Israel, therefore, should refrain from launching a preemptive attack on Iran. "Attacking Iran won't be an effective way of stopping its nuclear program."

If anything, an attack would probably embolden Iran to redouble its efforts to build an atomic arsenal, he warned.

Oppenheimer called on Jews in the Diaspora to get involved in Israeli politics.

"Israelis will make the final decisions, but Jews outside Israel should have a say. They need to speak up, whether on the left or the right, and hopefully, they will support Peace Now positions."

CELEBRATING 100 YEARS

Philip and Ruthie Ladovsky

Borscht and blintzes always popular

Although there was no formal menu when it first opened in 1912, among the restaurant's favourite offerings were pea and vegetable soup, cabbage borscht, gefilte fish and cheese blintzes. These items – cabbage borscht only on Fridays – are served to this day.

Aaron and Sarah's son Herman joined the business and worked at the Spadina Avenue location for 60 years, and Herman's children, Philip and Ruthie, are United Bakers' current owners.

Nathan said that a highlight of his week is when his grandmother, Dora, Herman's wife, comes into the restaurant, and he is able to make her a "special" grilled cheese sandwich.

In an interview with Philip and Ruthie at the restaurant, Philip said that many years ago, the two of them decided that they would be proud to carry on the family tradition.

Their first big decision was to open the Spadina location on Sundays.

"This 100-year anniversary is thrilling to us. Imagine being part of this business, and remaining true to its roots."

Ruthie said that although they still serve the longtime favourites – they shook things up some years ago by adding dill to the soup – their menu has evolved.

"We now have veggie burgers, grilled salmon with wasabi, rainbow trout, eggplant parmesan, Israeli salad – something for everyone. There is such a wide variety of menu items that some customers eat here two or three times a day. We respond to what customers are looking for."

Without question, however, soups are one of the favourite menu items. "Its not Monday in our business, its vegetable soup day, and its not Wednesday, it's potato soup day. Every day though, is pea soup day," Ruthie said.

They serve comfort food that everyone grew up with, she said.

"It's always consistent and always tastes the same. Our customers count on that. Our father was able to make every customer feel at home, and we try to do the same."

It's not only the customers who feel at home, said Phillip. "The staff is like an extended family. Some have been with us since we moved here."

Nathan said he feels like he grew up with a bunch of mothers. "When I would come in to visit, they would greet me warmly, with lots of questions."

The staff shares the customers' joys and sorrows, said Philip.

"They come to UB when they have their first child, their first grandchild, when they've gotten married, and when they [get up] from shivah. We share in their rights of passage."

Thornhill teacher promotes Holocaust education

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Last week marked the sixth year of the Adopt a Survivor program at Yorkhill Elementary School in Thornhill. The program, created by Harriette Fleising, a teacher at the school, is an interactive way for students to learn about the Holocaust and other genocides.

For Fleising, educating students about the Holocaust feels like a personal responsibility. "It's very dear and close to my heart," said the kindergarten teacher who is the child of Holocaust survivors. "I felt that the children should learn a piece of history."

Harriette Fleising

Fleising decided that the best way to teach that piece of history was to create the Adopt a Survivor program. Participating classes from grades 4 to 8 inclusive each "adopt" a Holocaust or genocide survivor and study their story as well as the history of the conflict or war.

Students are given a storybook about their survivor, printed and donated by Eleanor and Michael Rinne of Print Three in Toronto, which they study for 3-1/2 weeks. The students then hold a Holocaust and genocide memorial assembly at the end of the unit, where they are introduced to their adoptive survivors, either in person or through video-conferencing, depending on where the survivors live.

"They're so excited because it's not just information they're learning from a book," Fleising said.

The culminating assembly for this year's program was held last week in the school's gymnasium. The theme was child survivors of the Holocaust, and it included speeches by the director of the York Region District School Board, Ken Thurston, as well as executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada Frank Diamant. Following their speeches, students presented poetry and reflections about genocide, and there were video clips of the adoptive survivors, speeches by Holocaust survivor Jozef Cipin and a survivor of the Rwandan Genocide, Leo Kabalisa.

"The lesson is that we have to educate from a young age," Diamant told the students who were surrounded by decorations with information about the Holocaust, about genocides worldwide and about the dangers of bullying people because they are different.

Diamant stressed that the Holocaust happened in what people considered a "civilized" society, similar to the one in Toronto. He urged students to recognize the importance of tolerance. "Had there been that mutual respect of civilizations, there would never have been a Shoah," he said.

Feising told the audience how important it is for young children to understand the horrors of racism and of genocide, so that they can pave the way for a better future. "The challenge will be for the young generation to carry the torch, to recognize when injustice is done and to speak up," she said.

For Kabalisa, who barely escaped the Rwandan Genocide in the '90s, it is especially important that young people don't simply repeat the phrase "never again," but that they truly understand that they can make a difference in ending racism. "Every single time, we say 'never again,' and it happens again, and we [just] watch," he said. "However, when I see so many young students sitting here, listening quietly to what we say, I see a brightness in the future."

EATING FOR ISRAEL: On May 1, Ulpanat Orot students took part in the "America Eats for Israel" initiative. On that day, restaurants across North America donated a percentage of their profits to Meir Panim, an Israeli organization whose mission is to alleviate the harmful effects of poverty on thousands of Israeli families by supporting a range of food and social service programs. Pictured, from left, are Grade 10 students Yardena Katz, Rachel Gold, Sarena Meyer, Adina Tanen and Sarah Wapner, who organized a school-wide lunch through Pizza Café, one of the participating restaurants.

Police sergeant speaks out about Darfur genocide

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

We need to become global citizens and ensure that the genocide in Darfur does not continue, said Debbie Bodkin, a retired Waterloo Police sergeant.

She spoke to a roomful of people at the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies last week.

Bodkin was working as a police sergeant when she became interested in conflicts overseas.

In 2004, she was asked to join the Coalition for International Justice in Chad to interview refugees and victims who had entered the country after fleeing war-torn Sudan. The purpose of the interviews was to provide evidence to the U.S. State Department that a genocide was occurring in Darfur.

In 1989, Gen. Omar Bashir seized control of Sudan by military coup. Bashir was part of an Arab tribe, and soon the government was mainly composed of Arab tribe members, unlike the majority of the Sudanese population who are from African tribes.

Then in 2003, two Darfuri rebel groups, the Sudan Liberation Army and the Justice and Equality Movement, took up arms, accusing the government of oppressing black Africans in favour of Arabs, such as by sending the country's oil only to the Arab tribes. The government responded by sending Arab militia, known as "Janjaweed" (devils on horseback), who attacked the African tribes. Since the genocide began, 400,000 people have been killed and more than two million people are now displaced.

"One of the victims said to me, 'Life is nothing when you have no one left,' and we quickly found that the stories we were going to hear were always the same, no matter who we interviewed… stories of rape and murder," said Bodkin.

"There was one little guy named Mohammad, and he had a crush on me – I think he had never seen a white person. Before I left, his mother said to me, 'Please take him back with you, because he may not live to see another day here.' You know how much it would take for a mother to want to give away her son," she said.

After returning from Chad, she was determined to do more global work. This time, she entered the conflict itself, travelling to Darfur with the UN Commission of Inquiry for Darfur in January 2005. "The stories were the same, the only thing that differed was the number of people they lost," she said.

She said one man walked for three hours with his two young daughters to the camp where Bodkin was, so she could record their experiences. The two girls had been sent to get material to build a fire for their family and were sexually assaulted on the way and left to bleed in the middle of the desert. "They had no emotion left in them because of what they had been through," she said.

She spent three months in Darfur interviewing victims, but since the government sent spies to follow her and her team, she never actually witnessed any crimes. "It was a fake peace wherever we went. Some people said as soon as we moved on to the next building, they would bomb ours," she said.

A month after returning home, Bodkin was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder. "As a police officer, when there's a crime going on, it's our job to stop it. But the problem is, I couldn't stop it," she said.

She now speaks to audiences across Canada about her experiences, which she says is therapeutic for her, and as a way to ensure that these stories are not lost.

"Simon Wiesenthal believed in the pursuit of justice and he spent his life hunting down Nazi war criminals," said Nicole Betel, an education associate at the centre. "He believed that the history of man is the history of crimes, and crimes can repeat themselves, so information is our best defence."

Bodkin hopes that her stories help others become "global citizens" and raise awareness of crimes against humanity.

The moral lesson of Lag b'Omer

Rabbi Mark Fishman

Lag b'Omer, literally meaning the 33rd day of the Omer, is the one day of festivities in the midst of the 49 days of semi-mourning between Passover and Shavuot.

In biblical times, this bridge period between our Exodus from Egypt and the Divine revelation at Sinai comprised joyous days of the omer grain offering and a daily countdown of anxious expectation – "And you shall count for yourselves from the morrow after the Festival [of Passover], the day that you bring the grain [omer] of the wave offering, seven complete Sabbaths shall there be. To the morrow after the seventh Sabbath week shall you number 50 days." (Leviticus 23:15-16). Nevertheless, the ironies of history cast a tragic cloud over this seven-week period, when 24,000 students of Rabbi Akiva one of the greatest sages of the Mishnah, were felled by a plague.

The talmudic sage Rav Nachman gives the cause of this scourge as askara, which most commentaries explain as a plague of diphtheria. Others suggest it comes from the Greek sikarii, or sword, referring to the tragic defeat of the Bar Kochba rebellion against Rome – a rebellion that was supported by Rabbi Akiva and his disciples. Whatever the physical reason for their deaths, the Talmud definitively provides the moral cause of their downfall: "They did not accord each other proper respect" (B.T. Tractate Yevamot 62b).

It may be difficult to conceive that a mere lack of mutual respect should make the best and the brightest deserve such an extreme punishment, but the halachic reality of our daily lives has turned a biblical and climatic period bursting with new beginnings and new crops into a period of devastation – with no weddings, no social gatherings, no proper grooming.

Rabbinic Reflections

But there's one day when all this changes: Lag b'Omer. On that day, on the hill near Montefiore's Windmill in the heart of Jerusalem, streams of couples spend the day posing for the videographers and their cameras. It's not just the caterers and musicians and photographers who throw themselves into the charged atmosphere of the day; it's the barbers, the entertainers and the myriad youngsters of all ages who are enchanted by bonfires replete with snacks, songs and stories.

But when all is said and done, what exactly is the nation celebrating? Tradition has it that only on Lag b'Omer did the disciples of Rabbi Akiva not die. Big deal! What an anti-climax. Why such universal celebration because of a temporary respite of 24 hours from the plague? Even with this brief recess, the next day, 500 more sages lost their lives, as did 500 more every day thereafter until Shavuot.

A cynic can always ask: what's the significance of 500 less dead bodies when 24,000 corpses had to be buried? The answer is that every human life is of inestimable value. Apparently, the disciples of Rabbi Akiva didn't understand this fundamental Jewish truth, and, therefore, did not sufficiently respect each other, causing their colleagues pain and embarrassment. Subsequent generations had to learn to venerate and celebrate the fragility and dignity of life.

Judaism and sexuality

The basic attitude of Judaism toward sex and marriage begins with several related statements in the opening chapters of Genesis.

The Lord declares, "It is not good for man to be alone; I will make a fitting helper for him." Adam is put to sleep and God takes a rib from him from which he forms woman. When Adam awakes and sees Eve beside him, he speaks these portentous words, "This is now bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh... Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh."

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

The first of the Torah's commandments is, "Be fruitful and multiply." Celibacy is frowned upon in Judaism. Even the old, the weak, the sickly are entitled to marry.

Judaism and Jewish law are "chivalrous." The Bible, the Talmud and rabbinic literature abound in warm tributes to the "woman of valour" who looks diligently after her husband and children. Jewish ethics has much to say on how the wife is to be honoured and cherished.

But words of praise and approbation are not enough. Many Jewish women resent the legal inferiority and disabilities to which Jewish law subjects them – especially with respect to laws of marriage and divorce.

It is disgraceful that Jewish law leaves women totally and helplessly at the mercy of estranged husbands and spiteful brothers-in-law. It is insufferable to be "chained" to a man who has remarried and yet refuses to make it possible for his first wife or his deceased brother's childless widow to remarry.

Under strict traditional male-made law women can neither vote nor serve as witnesses. They are not counted in the prayer quorum of the minyan. Some of the talmudic sages, concerned that women were a source of sexual allurement, cautioned against holding even a casual conversation with them (Avot 1:5). They taught that men shouldn't touch a women or even shake hands in greeting.

Two provisions of the modesty laws with regard to women are so troubling that they divide Orthodox Jews even today. The first teaches that woman's hair is powerfully erotic and that no one but her husband should see it. This rule has led many Orthodox women to wear a wig in public.

The other rule makes listening to a woman's voice a grave sexual violation. Thus, those who observe this ruling may not attend the opera or theatre, or even listen to women's voices on radio, television or recordings.

Dov Linzer, an Orthodox rabbi, is the dean of a rabbinical school in New York. In a recent article in the New York Times he writes that the Talmud, in effect, warns the restrictive male that how he treats and regards women must involve his self-control and responsibility.

Romantic love, which is an expression of sexual desire, is natural, normal and good. Expressed in the best human spirit, this kind of love is part of the beauty of holiness. A modern poet expressed it best: "Love is biology set to music."

גידי קורן וחברים

Why the hoopla about Israel's 64th?

Yom Ha'atzmaut 2012 – the 64th anniversary of Israel's Declaration of Independence – has prompted a flurry of media coverage that is usually reserved for perhaps more significant events, such as 25th, 50th or 75th jubilees. Even turn-of-decade celebrations or a 65th might ordinarily be considered more defining.

However, if this is what fills column (or blog) space, we shouldn't complain. Much of it has been positive, sometimes, according to Israel's traditional adversaries, too positive. So, inevitably, when Google honoured Israel by decorating its online logo with Israeli flags (in what's known as a "doodle"), a Palestinian group responded by demanding their own depiction – of a Google emblem that instead referenced their "nakba" the perceived "catastrophe" that befell them when the Jewish State was established in 1948.

But amid the "feel-good" reporting, there is also a good dollop of balanced and insightful commentary that draws attention to the social, cultural, religious, political and existential predicaments that are so much part of what characterizes modern-day Israel. Despite its Herculean strides in creating the foundations of a civil society, a thriving democracy, a flourishing economy and a pride of place and purpose that are the envy of other nations of comparable age – and some much older – there remains within the Israeli psyche a pervasive uncertainty about where precisely the country is headed and what shape it will take in the next 64 years.

Of course, a lot is contingent on whether there's the political will within the current leadership and its successors to deal sensibly and resolutely with the myriad domestic flashpoints that demand attention. Among these are the deepening tensions between the haredim (an estimated 10 per cent of the Jewish population) and the rest of Israeli society, which can no longer be ignored.

My View

In addressing this, Times of Israel editor, David Horowitz recently commented that "the ad hoc arrangements that have produced, for the first time in Jewish history, an entire demographic sector that has abandoned the religious requirement to join the productive workforce, cannot be sustained." What is also unsustainable, Horowitz adds, is the Orthodox community's "stranglehold on life-cycle events."

Also needed is a prompt and unequivocal acceptance of Israel's High Court decision of late April to rescind the Tal Law, which, up until now, has permitted exemptions from military service for yeshiva students.

The alarming escalation in the cost of living, especially housing, in Israel – the focus we'll recall of last summer's "social justice protests" – is another example of the spectrum of issues that urgently require policy changes if Israel's democracy is to be further cultivated going forward.

Less controllable and ultimately more daunting are the uncertainties facing Israel from beyond its borders. Much will depend on how exactly the so-called "Arab Spring" (which is more aptly described an "Islamist spring") plays itself out and how Iran's march toward a hostile nuclear capability is confronted.

Israel at 64 may not represent a pivotal milestone in the country's history. Nonetheless, the media attention that it has attracted has had a fascinating, even salutary, effect. It has provided an opportunity for introspection, for those who care to re-evaluate past missteps and hopefully guide this precious haven through a deservedly healthy and vibrant middle age.

The ketubah: document of devotion, Pt. 2

If you are looking for inspiration for your own ketubah or just love Judaic art, the very best site to visit is the Ketubot Digitization Project. This Jewish National and University Library in Jerusalem has catalogued and made available on the web hundreds of ketubot from around the world, including classical ones from Afghanistan, Morocco, Latin America and Myanmar. [http://bit.ly/ketuba9]

Mark Mietkiewicz

The oldest ketubah on this site dates back to the year 1023 in Eretz Yisrael between the groom Natan HaCohen HaTzefati ben Shlomo and his bride, Rachel. Almost one millennium later, you can see Natan and Rachel's ketubah online – and dream about their lives. For more about this incredible collection, see the article in Cultivate Interactive magazine. [http://bit.ly/ketuba10]

If you want to possess a truly unique ketubah – and have some artistic flair – then why not create one yourself? I came across a site where the bride's mother decided to paint one as a wedding gift. She provides step-by-step instructions, along with these words to the faint of heart. "Don't be afraid to try! If you mess it up, you can always start again (or buy one). And as my daughter pointed out, in this day and age it's not that much of a trick to have something that's perfect – computers do it every day. What's exceptional is to have something made by hand, something personal, something with the quirks, eccentricities, and yes, even mistakes that show it's made by a human being." [http://bit.ly/ketuba11]

If you want some inspiration, here are two great places where you will find thousands of ketubot, mostly contemporary. Both Google Images [http://bit.ly/ketuba12] and Flickr will not disappoint. [http://bit.ly/ketuba13]

And here's a practical piece of advice if you're planning an out-of-town wedding and will be travelling with your ketubah. Roll it between sheets of acid-free tissue paper and pack it in an extra strong tube. "When you get to the location of your wedding, take your ketubah out of the tube and let it unroll. The paper will keep its curl for a while, but don't worry. The paper of your ketubah should easily 'forget' the curl over time." [http://bit.ly/ketuba14]

After the wedding is over and you have hung your ketubah on your wall, Anita Diamant says don't just admire your ketubah, read it regularly. She quotes the Baal Shem Tov, the 18th-century founder of Chassidism who "advised couples to re-read their ketubah whenever they were fighting. It would remind them, he said, of how they felt as brides and grooms, hopeful, smitten, surrounded by good wishes." [http://bit.ly/ketuba15]

But Diamant says it shouldn't take a fight to get couples to re-read their ketubah. "It ought to be one of those health-and-safety habits, like checking your smoke detector when you change the clocks for daylight savings. Likewise, on every wedding anniversary, Jewish couples should sit down and read the contract they signed with stars in their eyes... Even the most exquisite ketubah is never simply a work of art. A ketubah always signifies the Jewishness of a love story, a marriage, a home, a family, a past and a future."

Remember with tea, love and a cookie

Dorothy Lipovenko
Special to The CJN

They belong to a generation that loved to bake, and baked with love. Like most artists, these women were their own toughest critics, and each had her signature style: cookies of tender crumb, feathery sponge cake, mandelbread that snapped in the mouth.

These bakers are the last to inherit the shtetl way of making something from nothing, a generation whose "tech apps" were the 12 speeds on a Mixmaster's dial. Blend, mix, stir, fold, beat: what's the difference when everything goes into one bowl?

Ah, but the bakers knew.

And they knew, too, that their creations were the ultimate comfort food, offered with words sweeter than sugar: "Tomorrow you'll diet."

Baking was their pride, and now it is their legacy.

The women who raised us postwar boomers are on my mind of late. Their electric mixers are going silent. With a heavy heart I go to their funerals, pay shivah calls, send tribute cards to unfamiliar zip codes.

In middle age, I'm one of those women reaching for the phone to mend a frayed connection with the past, when a special baker from that era is gone.

It is no coincidence that in their grief, grown children are taking comfort in memories of a mother's baking. Sometimes in unexpected ways.

Two sons are giving the eulogy for their mother, a former schoolteacher. As always, a life lived must be telescoped into minutes. But they do so, eloquently. The oldest speaks of his mother's cooking as the heart and soul of family holiday dinners; it is her hamantashen he singles out for special mention.

Days later, a friend in Toronto shares an e-mail thread. She wants me to read some of the condolence messages from the family's old neighbourhood on the passing of her mother, Faye Grafstein, last year.

Here is one: "I often think of your mother, giving us cookies when we'd come to the door... sometimes we'd ask for [your sister] even though we knew she wasn't there – just to get a cookie and a smile!"

"May the aroma (and the tam of the wonderful memories) of her freshly baked cookies ... accompany her neshamah to its honoured place in Gan Eden," reads another.

The kids on that street are grown and long gone, scattered dozens or thousands of miles, but Faye Grafstein's elfin kitchen will always be just around the corner; no space would have been big enough for her sweet compassion, advice and legendary chocolate chip cookies and angel cake, fondly known as shmatte cake.

Almost 40 years later, we still sniff the air and summon those treats, because no child ever forgets who made them feel special or important.

Nor does a certain child, now a mother herself, ever forget Mrs. Grafstein's few choice words of wisdom (over juice and cupcakes) that would shape her approach to life. "Never wish time away."

Sadly, we can't wish back the good times. But we can remember: with tea, love and a homemade cookie.

CIJA slams United Church stance on Mideast

'There's an obsession with Israel that is totally distorted'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A longstanding disagreement over United Church statements on Israel burst into the open last week with Jewish leaders slamming a report by the church's working group on Israel/Palestine.

Shimon Fogel

The report contains "elements that are obscene to Jews," it "trivializes the Holocaust," questions Israel as a Jewish state, calls for a boycott and unfairly singles Israel out for condemnation while ignoring the plight of Christians around the world, said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

The report also distorts history, and focuses on Israeli settlements as an obstacle to peace, ignoring several Israeli evacuations of settlements and withdrawals as part of bids for peace, he said.

The document will be debated and voted on at the church's 41st General Council in August, which means it could be adopted as official church policy.

Forgel was particularly incensed with the document's reference to the Holocaust. The working group stated that "the deepest meaning of the Holocaust was the denial of human dignity to Jews." That statement was quickly followed by one lamenting the "loss of dignity" of the Palestinians, which the document asserts is due to Israeli occupation.

Not only does that distort the Holocaust, in which six million Jews were murdered, but it "draw[s] moral equivalence of Jewish suffering in the Holocaust with Palestinian suffering in the current situation," Fogel said.

"That assertion leads to conclusions that other motivations are at play beyond contributions to peace," he said.

"I think there are people within the United Church, like in academia and the labour movement, who are part of the movement to isolate and delegitimize Israel within the international community," he added.

Jewish community organizations have been at odds with the United Church over its views on the Middle East for some time. Earlier in the year, a task force of a Toronto presbytery of the church called on members of the church to boycott six Canadian and Israeli companies "who are enabling the illegal occupation."

In 2009, the church's General Council adopted policy items that called for Israeli withdrawal to pre-1967 lines and called for an end to "all forms of violence by the Israeli government upon the Palestinian people." The assembly, however, voted down a proposal for boycott, divestment and sanctions of Israel after Canadian Jewish Congress officials lobbied hard against the measure.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, who served as co-president of Congress at the time, said "it's a crying shame that between the last incarnation [of the General Council] in Kelowna [in 2009] and now, nothing seems to have changed.

"There's an obsession with Israel that is totally distorted. Nothing good can come out of this. It's unconscionable. It's gotten to the point that it's sickening."

Facing heated critiques of the working group's recommendations, United Church spokesman Bruce Gregersen said "we're deeply concerned about the interpretation that's been given to a section of the report [concerning the Holocaust "dignity" reference]. It's a small section of the report.

"We are clear that the intention was not in comparing the Holocaust to any other experience," he said, adding the church has always "upheld the nature of the Holocaust as being distinctive."

He said the document is consistent with the longstanding church position that removing settlements is the key to peace.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

"The church points to ongoing military occupation of Palestinian territory. The church has consistently said this has to be addressed for peace in the region," said Gregersen, the church's senior program officer.

He said the report explicitly rejected associating the term "apartheid" with Israel, adding that it accepted Israel as a Jewish state and rejected the suggestion that Israel should take in large numbers of Palestinians who would affect the country's demographic makeup.

The church, however, supports targeted boycotts of "settlement products," a position adopted by many churches and some Jews, including American liberal writer Peter Beinart, he said.

The church is inviting dialogue with CIJA to discuss its concerns, he added.

Rabbi Bulka said the measures advocated by the working group are consistently negative and aimed at hurting Israel.

"Don't give me this garbage of boycott. It's punishing one side. It's taking sides, and they don't have all the facts."

The working group's recommendations won't advance peace, he added.

Rabbi Bulka said it's likely the recommendations don't represent the views of the church's membership. "After Kelowna, I got calls from four church ministers who were fed up by this. I was invited to speak to [half a dozen] congregations, and it was a warm, fuzzy feeling."

Fogel believes the agenda on the Middle East has been led by a small group of activists who likely aren't representative of the wider church membership.

He said CIJA would continue to engage with the church in advance of its August gathering in Ottawa, "to reach out to our many friends in the church to reach an accommodation and amend the report.

"We will engage in dialogue with them over the next four months and we hope that we will be able to demonstrate the justification to amend the report in a way that eliminates the offensive sections and references."

"Failing to achieve that understanding, and if it goes to the General Council as endorsed, we will have to think carefully if there's any utility to continuing our relationship with the United Church," he said.

Campaign aims to boost organ donations

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Khaled Khatib was 13 years old when his brother was accidentally shot and killed by an Israeli soldier.

In 2005, the story of 11-year-old Ahmed Khatib, who was killed while playing with an imitation Uzi during a raid in Jenin, made international headlines when his parents decided to donate their son's organs to Israelis who were in desperate need of transplants.

George Marcello, founder of Step By Step, a non-profit organization that raises awareness about the importance of registering as an organ and tissue donor, has made the Khatibs the focus of his Torch of Life campaign in hopes of inspiring people to register to become potential donors.

Torch of Life is a province-wide campaign to register more than one million Ontarians as organ and tissue donors.

Ontario has one of the lower organ donor registry rates in the world at only 21 per cent.

The campaign's 75-city tour, which kicked off in Kenora on March 2, has been led by Khaled, now 20, who has been working with Marcello to raise awareness about the thousands of Canadians whose lives depend on receiving a transplant.

"I wanted Khaled to carry the torch through Ontario and I wanted to show... that it's not just not about organ donation but so many other reasons," Marcello said.

"We all can see how organ and tissue donations can bring the world closer, can benefit peace."

Khaled's brother's heart, kidneys, liver and lungs were transplanted into six Israelis – four of whom were Jewish.

Khatib, who spoke to The CJN through his interpreter, Ibrahim Hasan, said when his parents made the decision to donate Ahmed's organs he didn't know what to think.

"He was too young and was grieving. That was the last thing on his mind. Little by little as he saw the fruits of the labour and he realized what had happened and the positive outcome that came out of it, and the fact that he saw the people that were helped, he realized they were saved by his brother. He realized that his father made the right decision and he supported him," said Hasan, who translated for Khaled.

He said when he was approached by Marcello to take part in the Torch of Life campaign, he was eager to play an active role.

"It didn't take him long to decide that he could help the people who are still on the waiting list. He wanted to be a voice for these people."

Khaled marched the Ottawa leg of the Torch of Life relay in late March in honour of Hélène Campbell, who was waiting for a double-lung transplant. When he learned that she had found a match last month, he was moved to tears.

"He said he was just as happy in that moment as he was when his brother's organs were given to the Israeli families. It had brought joy to him and to his heart and he was extremely happy," Hasan said.

Arie Raif, president of the Canadian Friends of the Meir Medical Centre, said he helped connect Marcello with the Khatibs because he hoped their story might move Canadians to act.

"We at the Meir hospital in Israel, which treats Israeli Arabs, Palestinians and Israelis, believe that we talk too much and we do very little," Raif said.

He said despite the talmudic injunction that "he who save a life saves an entire world," many Jews still don't think it's permissible to donate organs.

"If you're brought up to believe that your body needs to be whole when the Mashiach comes, it's hard to change that belief," Raif said.

"But in a world of terror, to talk about organ donation and co-operation between people in the Middle East, it's like trying to part the Red Sea again."

He said most major religions preach the importance of supporting life, and education is the key to getting people to realize that all the major religions endorse organ donation.

"Whether it is a Palestinian who donates to five Israeli kids, or an Israeli who donates to five Palestinian kids, it means that they broke the barrier of ignorance. We have to make sure that happens. That's why we endorse Step by Step, that's why I devoted my time," Raif said.

The goal is to make Ontario a leader in organ donation, Marcello added. "If we reach the one million mark we're aiming for, we can save 900 extra lives that would otherwise die. What could be more honourable than that?"

Exactly halfway through the tour, having visited 37 cities, with 38 more on the itinerary, Marcello said he's looking forward to the last leg of the tour.

Medical student organizes bone-marrow drives

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — When Warren Fingrut started medical school at the University of British Columbia last year, the 21-year-old Toronto student started inquiring about stem cell drives on campus.

"I'd been involved in stem cell drives in 2009 and 2010, while I was studying at McMaster," he says. "That's when I learned that all you had to do to join the registry of Canadian donors was to swab a cheek. So when I came to UBC, I started wondering why no one had organized a drive here."

Recognizing the need for more drives, Fingrut founded a club in his medical school, called it Medical Students for Stem Cell Networks and recruited several of his colleagues to join. Then he partnered with Hillel, which has led bone marrow drives on other Canadian campuses, and organized three drives on the British Columbia campuses of UBC, the University of Victoria and Simon Fraser University.

"The Canadian stem cell registry is dreadfully low, and there are only 340,000 volunteer donors on its list," he says. "Something like four per cent of Canadians donate blood regularly, but much fewer are on the stem cell donor registry. Our goal was to address this problem and improve the registry by signing up young donors. For people who need a stem cell or bone marrow transplant, this can save their lives."

The students called their stem cell drive campaign "May The Swab Be With You" and at the drives, recruited students to swab their cheeks and fill out some paper work so that their genetic profile can be recorded. Once registered, a potential donor may be contacted to donate if someone in need of a bone-marrow graft with a matching genetic profile is found.

More than 900 Canadians with a blood cancer (lymphoma, leukemia, myeloma), autoimmune disease or bone-marrow infection are currently looking for a match but less than 30 per cent will find a match from within their family. A patient has the best chance of finding a match within their own ethnic group.

The three British Columbia drives succeeded in signing 686 students to OneMatch, the Canadian stem cell and bone marrow donor registry, a program of Canadian Blood Services. Next year, Fingrut plans to hold more drives in more locations and expects a much bigger yield.

"There's no obligation to donate once you become a volunteer donor, but if there is a match for your stem cells, most of the time it's just like a blood donation," he says. The process of extracting stem cells is called apheresis and is no more painful than having an IV inserted into your arm.

One needle is inserted into each arm, pulling the stem cells from the body and separating them from the blood, which is returned to the donor. The process takes between four and six hours and the optimal population of donors is young, healthy men between the ages of 17 and 35. "Young, healthy male donors produce the rest results post-transplant," says Cassandra DeLuca, OneMatch co-ordinator of donor management for Western Canada. "In general, results aren't as good for women and for donors older than 35."

Not everyone who joins the registry will be eligible to donate, but the idea is to get a well-rounded group of diverse donors who can be accessed if they are needed, she adds. For this reason, Fingrut's initiative for the stem cell drive is invaluable. "Having young healthy males like Warren leading the charge and taking a strong leadership role in his own community – both his medical-student community and the broader student community at UBC – is imperative for our mission."

60 Minutes misses the point

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week's column looked at how recent media attention to the broader Middle East following the "Arab Spring" has resulted in less media negativity toward Israel over the past year.

By no means was that meant to deny the persistence of what has been, for decades, the hallmark of often unfair coverage of Israel: a failure or refusal to keep events in perspective. We've seen this time and again in the tendency to shift the onus onto Israel for unwelcome developments caused primarily by Arab regimes and growing Islamic militancy.

In his April 28 National Post column on the recent 60 Minutes segment on CBS titled "Christians of the Holy Land," Robert Fulford forcefully captured this failure of perspective:

"Across the Middle East this year, Christians are in more trouble than at any previous point in memory. Massacres and beatings by Islamist mobs have caused 200,000 Copts to leave Egypt, their home for 16 centuries. In Iraq, scores of churches have been burned and many worshippers killed. The Christian population in most Arab states is sharply declining.

"So last Sunday, the producers of the CBS show 60 Minutes did an item exposing the problems that afflict Christians... in Israel."

Fulford called this "a colossal case of missing the point" since Israel is the only country in the Middle East where Christians can practise their faith without fear. Indeed, Israel is the only place in the region where the Christian population is actually growing.

On the surface, 60 Minutes did not blame Israel entirely for the Christian decline in the West Bank. The feature included sources who said that Christians have become victims of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and were being "squeezed" between a growing Muslim majority and Jewish settlements. But the onus clearly fell on Israel for its occupation.

The program downplayed the role of militant Islam in the Christian decline. When Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to the United States, indicated that "the major duress" the Palestinian Christians face comes from Muslims, 60 Minutes host Bob Simon switched immediately to Palestinian businessman Zahi Khouri. The owner of the Coca-Cola franchise in the West Bank, Khouri claimed never to have heard, from any of his 12,000 customers, of a single instance in which a Christian has left because of "Islamic persecution." No other voice from the Palestinians was heard telling a different story.

> Israel is only country in Mideast where Christians can practise faith without fear

But when it comes to judging credibility, Simon's focus, as Fulford made clear, was directed elsewhere – squarely on Oren. "Michael Oren... appeared on the program as a whipping boy for Simon," Fulford wrote. Oren was to be upbraided for having had the gall to complain to Simon's boss when he, Oren, learned about the distorted nature of the pending report. How, Oren asked, can you latch onto Israel when "one of the great stories in history" – the persecution of Christians in the Middle East unrelated to the Jewish state – is being ignored? That, said an exasperated Oren, is "outrageous, completely incomprehensible."

As Fulford noted, Simon simply ignored the fact that Oren is a distinguished historian who just happens to be a regional expert. What mattered to Simon was not historical context, but Oren's infraction in going above his head. Thus Simon charged: "And that was reason to call the... chairman of CBS News?" (Jeff Fager, chairman of CBS News for a little over a year, also happens to be executive producer of 60 Minutes, a show with which he's been affiliated for many years.) So in going over Simon's head, Oren didn't actually go all that far. Yet as Fulford explained, to Simon it was an inexcusable "crime" for which Oren was going to pay. And pay he did – on camera.

Oren may not have been at the top of his form in steering through this trap. But the fact remains that Oren's concerns were entirely validated by the distorted segment that CBS aired. And sadly, Oren is right about the big picture: the persecution of Christians across the Middle East remains largely ignored.

VANCOUVER — There's no denying that Vancouver author Robyn Michele Levy has had a difficult time over the past five years. Between learning she had early-onset Parkinsons, coupled only months later by a diagnosis of breast cancer, the 48-year-old was well overdue for some good news.

So when her memoir, Most of Me (Greystone Books, 2011), was nominated as a finalist for the Stephen Leacock Memorial Medal for humour writing last month, it was a timely dose of comfort. As it turns out, the award went to Patrick DeWitt for his book The Sisters Brothers, but the nomination itself was breath of fresh air in Levy's life.

"My mom had just passed away two weeks prior and her name was Lea Levy, so this was a lovely gift of comfort and acknowledgment," says Levy, who never quite intended to write a book in the first place.

Around the time she was undergoing operations, her friends and family were so worried and concerned that she decided to send them quirky, weekly e-mail updates "to let everyone know what was going on and to try and cheer them up," she says.

The e-mails landed in the inbox of a publisher who was a friend of a friend, and the result was Levy's memoir, wherein she incorporates some of her e-mails, but writes mostly about her experience over the course of treatment for breast cancer and Parkinsons, two summers ago. It's heavy subject matter for a humour writing nomination, but it's precisely Levy's dark sense of humour that lifts readers from the doldrums of her illnesses, lightens the mood of her book and instigates unexpected bursts of laughter throughout.

"I'm an artist and I began to apply my creative perspective to some of the experiences I was going through," she explains. "I was among the 50 per cent of Parkinsons patients with depression, and as I began treatment for that, my sense of humour came back."

Robyn Michele Levy

That humour litters Most of Me with laugh-out-loud funny moments that would not appear humorous out of context – which is why I won't quote them now – but in the memoir, add mirth and insight into Levy's wonderful perspective. We're taken into doctors' offices, into private conversations with friends and into her marriage, playing witness to her personal struggle and how those around her participate in it, try to offer comfort and deal with the uncertainty she endures by way of her illnesses.

"The crux of the story is about relationships between myself and my family, caregivers, relatives, strangers and neighbours," she says. "It's really about community and how much we depend on each other."

Though the core content is very serious, Levy adds her intention throughout was for Most of Me to be seen as a funny book. "The nomination lifted my spirits so much," she confesses. "Even as I was writing it, I had in the back of my mind that it would be so great to be nominated for this award. It was a secret little dream and that part came true, which was wonderful."

New shul planned for Winnipeg

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A new shul just in the process of being formed in Winnipeg has the potential to affect the membership of the city's largest and oldest congregation.

That's because Rabbi Larry Pinsker, currently in his final months as associate rabbi at the Conservative Shaarey Zedek Synagogue – which has more than 1,000 member families and last year welcomed 1,500 people to High Holiday services – will become spiritual leader of the new entity, to be called Beit Knesset Hadash, or the New Shul.

Prior to coming to Shaarey Zedek in 2004, the Reconstructionist-trained Rabbi Pinsker served as the rabbi of Toronto's only Recontructionist shul, Congregation Darchei Noam, from 1991 to 2002 and as interim associate rabbi for a year at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, a Conservative congregation, also in Toronto.

About a year ago, the Shaarey Zedek executive told Rabbi Pinsker that the synagogue would not be renewing his contract. The executive didn't give shul members an explanation for the controversial decision.

Pinsker's wife, Laurelle Harris Pinsker, is president of and spokesperson for Beit Knesset Hadash. In an e-mail, she stated the New Shul is planning to hold regular Shabbat services at a location still to be determined, as well as High Holiday services at the Fort Garry Hotel, one of Winnipeg's most prestigious inns, which has kosher catering under the supervision of Chabad Rabbi Avraham Altein.

Harris Pinsker told The CJN that since the announcement about the New Shul on April 27, there have been a number of inquiries, and several families and individuals have committed to joining.

"We are excited that the response has been so positive, especially from Jews who have previously not been affiliated with other synagogues in Winnipeg," Harris Pinsker said.

"It's too early to tell what our numbers will be, but we believe we are offering a creative and viable option to which Winnipeg Jews will respond."

When asked about the new congregation, Ian Staniloff, Shaarey Zedek's executive director, would only say that "we wish Rabbi Pinsker well in his future endeavours."

The New Shul could also have an impact on the last new congregation to be established in Winnipeg. Congregation Shir Tikvah was formed in the aftermath of the merger of three large north Winnipeg synagogues in June 2002, which resulted in the creation of Congregation Etz Chayim.

Some members of the three synagogues involved in the merger were unhappy with the result and started their own congregation, initially for the High Holidays only. While Shir Tikvah will be hosting its 10th High Holiday services this fall, there has been little interest among attendees in expanding the congregation's activities year-round.

Consul General to award winners: stay young

Michaelle Bitran

Amir Gissin, consul general of Israel in Toronto and Western Canada, was received by a roomful of applause at the 16th annual Hillel Student Awards ceremony last week.

The message that garnered the enthusiastic cheers was no doubt something the students wanted to hear: "Don't get old too quickly," he said. "For the moment you'll be more successful if you continue to be wild."

Gissin was called to the podium in the packed basement of the University of Toronto's Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life to receive the Founding Friend of the Campus Award. This honour, reserved for those who have made an outstanding contribution to Jewish student life, was also bestowed on Allen Berg, the sponsor of the Harvey's Table affordable kosher meals on campus initiative.

The student winners of the evening came from campuses across Toronto, including York University, U of T, Ryerson University, George Brown College and OCAD University. This past year saw a marked growth in Jewish student involvement particularly at Ryerson and George Brown, both schools with fewer Jewish students.

"It's a privilege to meet and work with such amazing students that we have here in Toronto," said Lindy Goodman, the outgoing chair of the board of directors of Hillel of Greater Toronto. She spoke at the beginning of the ceremony, along with the organization's executive director Zac Kaye and student MCs Isaac Kates Rose and Polina Isakharova.

All the speakers expressed enthusiasm about Hillel's recent initiative to reach out to both Jewish and non-Jewish students and groups on campus in an effort to create a more inclusive and co-operative campus environment. "Today we see the result of that," said Gissin, referring to the importance of this kind of outreach. "We see the results in every campus. We see the decline of those who are working against us."

Some of the awards presented for these new initiatives include the Chefs for Peace Award, won by Maxa Sawyer, Avram Heisler, Lisa Wilder, Ishraq Alim, Eitan Gilboord and Mitch Reiss; the Black Jew Dialogue Award, won by Christopher Better, Johann Keens and Mitch Reiss, and the TGIF Award, won by Ishraq Alim and Marty Rotenberg.

Hillel of Greater Toronto has also been making efforts to expand its reach within the Jewish community, with new programs for Russian Jews, Israelis and Jewish students interested in media and the arts.

Some awards given for the first time this year include the Julie M. Gallery Emerging Jewish Artist Fellowship, awarded to Dov Smiley, Rebecca Ihilchik, Liat Shalom, Shlomi Amiga and Dorona Zierler, as well as the Top Score Media Fellowship, awarded to Alan Hudes.

Toward the end of the ceremony, Shelly Feld, the incoming chair of the board of directors, presented the Outstanding Alumni Award to former York U student Ryan Levey. Feld emphasized the importance of staying involved in the Jewish community after graduation and of continuing to make a meaningful contribution to Jewish life as an adult.

"This is a first and early step in your journey," he said to the award winners in the audience, "but we hope you will stay involved."

Hamiltonian was tireless advocate for Israel

Abigail Cukier
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON, Ont. — Compassionate, strong, inspiring.

These three words kept coming up as friends remembered Rose Lax, who died suddenly of natural causes on April 28 in Hamilton, Ont., at age 66.

Lax was known throughout the world for her tireless advocacy for Israel.

She was buried May 1 in Jerusalem, next to her parents and brothers. Israeli cabinet minister Benny Begin, son of the late Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, who was a good friend of the family, spoke at her funeral.

"Rose was passionate and devoted to the Jewish people. She was a strong, focused person," said Sima Aronowicz, a friend of Lax and a member of the Hamilton-based Never Again Group, which Lax co-founded in 2010 to counter what she saw as political and existential threats to Israel and western democratic values.

"She was the most amazing person with regard to motivating us to stand up. She gave us the courage and made us strong.

"Rose taught me to be proud to be a Jew, to be proud of Israel. She empowered me."

Lax was born in a displaced persons camp in Uzbekistan to Holocaust survivors about nine months after World War II ended.

She and her parents, Morris and Golda, moved to Israel, where Morris fought for the establishment of the Jewish State. He stood side by side with Zionist Revisionist leader Ze'ev Jabotinsky and Menachem Begin, the future prime minster, with whom he remained lifelong friends.

Morris and Golda instilled within Rose the religious and nationalistic Jewish values that would form the backbone of her being.

But for Rose, family was paramount. As the oldest of four, with three siblings with special needs, she tended to them with love and sensitivity.

The family moved to Hamilton in 1948. Morris went on to found Morris Lax Metals and was a very successful businessman until he was murdered in 1992. The case remains unsolved.

"Throughout her years, she witnessed indescribable tragedies, challenges and heartaches. Yet despite the myriad of thorns thrown her way, her spirit only grew stronger. Not only did Rose have the strength to continue her own march of life, she became the beacon of strength to so many others," Rabbi Daniel Green of Hamilton's Adas Israel Congregation said at Lax's funeral.

"Rose Lax was one of the most remarkable people and passionate Jews that I have ever met," Rabbi Green said in his eulogy. "To capture the enormity of her legacy in words, to adequately express the impact she had upon me on and so many others, is an impossibility.

"For Rose, it was never about Rose. She was utterly selfless. She lived life for everyone but herself. Her life was her family. Her life was her friends. And most importantly her life was her people and the State of Israel."

Gary Gerofsky met Lax after he wrote a letter to the editor regarding Israel. Lax called to congratulate him and the two became friends and founded the Never Again Group, which was formed to counter political and existential threats to Israel.

Gerofsky said he'll miss Lax's daily calls to talk about anything and everything – especially Israel.

"There was no one like her. She was a real fighter. She taught us that you need to be grounded in what you believe in and never be swayed," Gerofsky said. "She believed that if you don't stand up, we are doomed to repeat history."

Lax was also charitable with causes such as Israel and the United Way, and in funding programs for hungry children. When students at McMaster University were intimidated about standing up and fighting for Israel, Lax was there to support and guide them.

Rose was, most of all, a dedicated mother to Daisy and her son-in-law Kent and a devoted grandmother to Olivia, Asher and Ben, with whom spending time was her greatest pleasure.

In his eulogy, Rabbi Green noted that Lax's name was an encapsulation of her essence.

"The Jewish nation is called a rose – 'kashoshana ben hachochim' – a rose among the thorns," he said. "Rose's middle name was Kreindel – a Yiddish expression for crown. A crown personifies the ideals of a nation. What we strive for as a people, our mission and goals.

"Roiza Kreindel, was our crowning rose. More than anyone else I have ever known, she raised the crown of the Jewish people."

Tour ends in Toronto

The tour will end on June 19 in Toronto, with a march to Queen's Park.

Marcello said he wants to invite the family of the late Yoni Jesner, a 19-year-old Jewish student who was killed in a suicide bombing in Tel Aviv in 2002, to join Khaled on the last leg of the tour.

Jesner's family decided to donate Yoni's organs, which saved the life of a Palestinian girl from east Jerusalem.

Barbara Landau and Shahid Akhtar, co-chairs of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, learned about Khaled's involvement with Torch of Life and have chosen to honour both Khaled and Marcello at the next CAJM meeting.

"We are moved by the heart-wrenching and heart-warming story of Ahmed Khatib. The response of Khaled and his family are an inspiration to all of us. We can all register for the organ donation program, both as a vehicle for peace between our communities, and for the saving of precious lives," Landau said.

To register to become an organ donor, visit www.beadonor.ca.

Zareinu to host ride to aid terror victims in Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

Even when the missiles are not falling in Israel and the sirens are silent, terror's grip can still be felt – and its devastating effects can last a lifetime.

In Israel today, there are more than 10,000 victims of terror, many of whom suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder. They are bereaved parents, widows and widowers, orphans and children who have lost siblings and parents. But the resilience of the Jewish People and their belief that every life is valued led to the creation in 2002 of One Family Fund, to help terror victims overcome the many challenges they face and return to life.

The 8th Annual Team One Family Fund 50-k Ride takes place on Sunday, June 24 in Toronto, to raise funds to help terror victims (optional 100-k and 100-mile routes are also available).

This year's ride, which is hosted by Zareinu Educational Centre, starts at Holy Trinity School, 11300 Bayview Avenue, Richmond Hill, and follows a scenic route through Durham County. All registrants will receive an $18 Pickle Barrel gift certificate and a Louis Garneau bike jersey. Participants who raise the minimum $1,000 for One Family Fund will be entered into a draw to win a $1,500 credit toward any bike in the Louis Garneau store and receive a free spring tune-up at Cyclepath Norco, 2106 Yonge St.

The One Family Ride took place up north in Stouffville in past years, but this year, One Family is entering a team in the Zareinu Ride to raise money for child victims of terror in Israel.

"This relationship seemed to be a natural fit because Zareinu is committed to helping children with special needs locally, while One Family helps child terror victims in Israel," said Michael Rosen, director of special events for One Family Fund Canada.

"This year's ride will honour the memory of more than 75 murdered children while raising much-needed funds to continue One Family's work supporting thousands of injured and bereaved families, maimed and traumatized youth and young adults in 2012," Jonathan Latsky, one of the ride's co-chairs, said.

For further information or to register, please visit www.onefamilyfund.ca/events-bike, or phone 416-489-9687, ext. 200.

Family fundraising to cure daughter

Compiled by CJN Staff

Courtney Render, 22, was diagnosed with Hodgkin's lymphoma, a type of cancer that affects white blood cells, two and a half years ago.

Since then, she has been fighting the disease, even while completing a bachelor of education at McGill University.

Right now, she is being treated in a private clinic in Toronto with the drug bendamustine, which is meant to put her as close as possible to a remissive state, but will ultimately not cure her. This month, Courtney will take her last dosage of the drug, having reached the maximum number of dosages permitted.

The Render family has chased all the possible treatments for Courtney in Canada, and they are now looking to take her to the United States for an option that could finally cure her.

The procedure is called an allogeneic stem-cell transplant, and it is generally only given to patients for whom an autologous transplant has failed. The allogeneic transplant will use cells from a donor, most likely Courtney's mother or her eldest sister.

This complicated transplant is offered and best performed by select, well-reputed hospitals, including the Fred Hutchison Research Center in Seattle, the University of Texas MD Anderson Cancer Center in Houston and the Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore.

There is, however, one big problem with this possible cure. On a recent visit to the Fred Hutchison Research Center, the Renders discovered that the cost for the treatment would be about $600,000 upfront. Also, they learned that Courtney's care during recovery (which can take about four months) and the treatment of any complications would require additional funds.

Thus far, the Renders have spent upward of $150,000 on Courtney's treatments. Now, they are reaching out to fundraise enough money to cover this expensive procedure. It must be done as soon as possible after her current drug treatment ends in late May, while her body is closer to a remissive state.

The Render family will be hosting a fundraising evening with hors d'oeuvres, raffles, silent auctions and music on June 13 at 7:30 p.m. at the Avenue Banquet Hall, at 1600 Steeles Ave. W., Concord, Ont.

Israeli elections set for Sept. 4

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli cabinet on Sunday morning authorized early elections for Sept. 4, meaning the current Knesset will soon be dissolved, even though the law doesn't require that elections be held before October 2013.

In speaking of the decision to hold early elections, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told the cabinet, "I would have been very happy if we could have completed the term, which was also my goal, but it is no secret that with the start of the government's fourth year, the coalition is fraying somewhat.

"It therefore seems to me that the right thing to do is to go for a brief election campaign. We are proposing Sept. 4, after which, God and voters willing, we will receive a mandate, create stability, and successfully lead the State of Israel in dealing with the great challenges we still face."

Netanyahu said he intends to form "as broad a government as possible" after the vote. Current poll show that his Likud party could garner up to 30 seats, up from its current 27, in the next election.

"For dozens of years, there hasn't been a more stable government in Israel," Netanyahu said. "But it is no secret that with the beginning of the fourth year of this term, there has been some instability within the coalition – between parties and within parties."

Netanyahu said that the weakening of the coalition harms Israel's security, economy, and society, so the right thing to do is "to launch speedy elections."

Meanwhile, Labor chair Shelly Yachimovich said on Saturday she would consider joining a Likud-led coalition only if she would be able to help shape the government's agenda.

Speaking to Channel 2 Television, she said that "only if Likud gets a relatively small number of seats and the possibility of creating a new agenda is at hand will we consider such a partnership. Other parties will rush to join a Netanyahu government at any cost."

Yachimovich added that if she becomes prime minister, she would immediately launch peace talks with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and nurture Israel's relations with Egypt and Turkey.

"Yachimovich and Netanyahu are waging an orchestrated assault on Kadima," aides to party leader Shaul Mofaz said yesterday, adding that Kadima, which holds the largest number of seats in the current Knesset, at 28, would no longer put up with it.

"Yachimovich lacks the most basic experience in every field. At the end of the day, this is how it goes: vote Yachimovich, get [Netanyahu]," Mofaz said.

Yair Lapid

In response to Yachimovich's remarks, a Likud official said Netanyahu would turn to Mofaz and centrist candidate Yair Lapid before seeking a partnership with Labor, because her economic policies are not in line with Netanyahu's.

"We have more in common with Mofaz and Lapid than [far-right Foreign Minister Avigdor] Lieberman," the official added, alluding to Likud's current partnership with Yisrael Beiteinu, the party Lieberman leads.

Johnson defeats Livingstone's challenge

JTA

LONDON — Former London mayor Ken Livingstone, who stirred controversy with remarks called antisemitic by the city's Jewish leaders, lost his bid to reclaim his post.

Incumbent Boris Johnson, Livingstone's successor, won the tight mayoral race in London, according to results announced late last Friday.

Johnson, of the conservative Tory Party, garnered 51.5 per cent of the vote compared to 48.5 per cent for Livingstone of the Labor Party.

London Jewish leaders said Livingstone, in a March meeting, made remarks that they called nearly "classic antisemitism." Livingstone said that the Jewish community would not vote for him because "the Jewish community is rich." The Jewish leaders also said that Livingstone had used the words Zionist, Jewish and Israeli interchangeably and "in a pejorative manner."

Livingstone apologized for the statements and called on the Jewish community to "move on from the 'Ken and the Jews dramas.'"

The meeting was held to discuss Livingstone's support of radical Muslim cleric Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi and his accepting money from Iranian state broadcaster Press TV. Livingstone has been a frequent critic of Israel.

Bat mitzvah gift sends 50 survivors to Jerusalem

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Toronto native Noa Weinzweig's decision to donate her bat mitzvah money to Holocaust survivors spiralled her into the Israeli media spotlight and landed her in a seat across from Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Noa, who moved to Herzliya from Toronto with her family 4-1/2 years ago, used her bat mitzvah gift money to finance a three-day vacation to Jerusalem for 50 Holocaust survivors.

All of Israel's major news companies sent out reporters to interview the English-speaking teenager who – as Peres said – managed to "raise the spirits of our entire nation" with one goodwill gesture.

Noa told The CJN she hoped "others will start donating to survivors, because they don't get the attention they deserve. These are the strongest people I have ever met. I will never forget them. After all they went through, they deserve happiness, peace and joy."

Noa, who is now 13, said that last year, when her parents, Nirit Gilboa and Jeffrey Wynn, spoke to her about the importance of giving back to society, she knew that she would ask her guests to contribute to Holocaust survivors.

It's a tradition in her family to give bar/bat-mitzvah money away. Her brother, Dean, now 18, donated his bar mitzvah funds to Beit Halochem, which aids Israeli veterans, five years ago.

"Jeff and I felt very strongly that our children's bar/bat mitzvah is an opportunity to educate them to give back to society and introduce them to tzedakah," Gilboa told The CJN.

Noa attended Bialik Hebrew Day School and Crestwood School while living in Toronto and now studies at the American International School in Even Yehuda. She lives with her four siblings and mother in Herzliya full-time during the year, while her father commutes from Toronto every five weeks. The whole family returns to Toronto every summer, and Noa still attends Camp Winnebago in Huntsville, Ont.

While donating part of bar/bat-mitzvah gifts is more commonplace, the notion of giving away everything struck a chord with Israelis.

The media storm that accompanied the all-expenses-paid trip for the 50 Holocaust survivors caught the family off-guard, said Gilboa, (who was born on Kibbutz Kfar Menachem and grew up on Kibbutz Degania Alef).

After all, Noa celebrated her bat mitzvah last year. But because of the planning and waiting for good weather, the emotion-packed holiday for the survivors only took place at the beginning of this month.

The Holocaust survivors who took part in the trip praised Noa's action, calling it "an act from the heart" and "beyond admirable."

"I was under the impression that people think about us only on Holocaust Remembrance Day and forget about us the rest of the year," one survivor told the Jerusalem Post. "But this young lady has given us such a heart-warming experience, simply because she cares."

Even the president cleared his schedule to host Noa and the survivors at his official residence in Jerusalem.

"There are no words to describe my meeting with Mr. Peres. I will never forget this day. He was so kind and made me feel very special," Noa said.

"Meeting President Peres was extremely exciting and very moving under the circumstances. He was extremely pleasant and very welcoming towards Noa," says her mother. "I didn't give the meeting with him much thought, but the outcome has been unbelievable and has created a lot of awareness towards Holocaust survivors, which is very rewarding."

Peres told Noa that she did "something exemplary" and that "sometimes a nation needs to learn from its children. You have taught us an exceptional lesson."

"All the survivors I met touched my heart. I look at life differently now. This was an experience I will never forget," she said. "I really hope others will listen to my words and start more awareness towards the Holocaust.

"I hope [people] will look up to what I did and will help others. I hope my story will encourage other kids to donate to any causes that they believe in."

France turns left — a rocky road

Anshel Pfeffer
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In the end, Nicolas Sarkozy was not so far from achieving an upset victory at the last moment. Two months ago, he was losing in the polls by a two-digit margin, but just before the election, he had managed to narrow it down to less than four per cent.

The March terror attacks in Toulouse and the temporary shift of the electoral agenda to issues of immigration and cohesion gave an opening to "Monsieur Sécurité," but it was simply not enough.

"President Bling" had come up against an immovable barrier of derision and loathing. It isn't so much that mild-mannered "Mr. Normal" Francois Hollande captured the imagination of the voters – too many of them just could not bear to see Sarkozy on their television screens and in the Élysée for even one more day.

The socialists are back in power after 17 years, but they could hardly wish for a less auspicious set of circumstances for themselves. The nation Hollande now leads is fractured and muddled – the fact that his party's traditional voters, the working class, gave more votes to Marine Le Pen's far-right Front National in the first round of voting should serve as a severe warning that the expectations of the French masses have been drastically let down.

Hollande has promised his compatriots he would defy the current trend of austerity being preached in the other capitals of Europe. His generous spending plans, which will cost at least 20 billion euros (according to his calculations), include hiring 60,000 new teachers. His spending plans fly in the face of a bleak fiscal reality. France already spends more of its GDP on welfare (28.4 per cent) than any other developed country and its debt-to-GDP ratio is set to reach 90 per cent this year. While a similar financial crisis in France such as Spain is currently undergoing still seems inconceivable, the new French government may be forced very soon to renege on some of its more outlandish election promises.

The new government will also face some very hard decisions on the future of its relationship with the European Union and especially with its partner in leading Europe – Germany. Hollande will have some tough talks already this week with Chancellor Angela Merkel on his reservations regarding the new tight fiscal restraints Germany has imposed on the Eurozone. If they fail to reach an agreement, and Merkel is unlikely to back down, the joint currency could be back at the brink of meltdown in a matter of weeks.

Hollande, though, may be magnanimous in victory. After all, Sarkozy's remarks earlier this year that France should be more like Germany and the close relationship he enjoyed with the chancellor probably helped Hollande, in his quiet way, capitalize on the hurt feelings of many French voters.

Sarkozy will be missed in Israel where he was always seen as a friendly president without too many demands. French expatriates in Israel voted for him overwhelmingly in the first round (81 per cent). The leader of the CRIF, Richard Prasquier, expressed concerns that some of Hollande's left-wing allies would use their new ruling position to mobilize sentiments against Israel. Considering the problems the new government is facing closer to home, it is a safe bet that Israel will not be very high on its agenda any time soon.

The failure of the moderate-right to hold on to the reins of power and Sarkozy's departure from the political arena leaves the door open to a much more sinister nationalist opposition. Le Pen can claim to have succeeded in some degree to detoxify the Front National brand, and she will mount a battle to take the fallen mantle of leader of the right. If Sarkozy stays around long enough to anoint a credible successor, he will have done France a greater service than anything he achieved during his single-term presidency.

Livni leaves Knesset

Former Kadima party leader Tzipi Livni resigned from the Knesset last week, warning in her resignation address that Israel's leaders are putting the country's existence at risk by choosing to ignore the mounting impatience on the part of the international community. Livni submitted her resignation after she lost the leadership of Kadima to Shaul Mofaz.

Assassin's brother freed

Hagai Amir, 43, who helped his brother, Yigal Amir, plot the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, was released from prison May 4. He had been in jail 16 years and has never expressed remorse for his role in the Nov. 4, 1995, murder of the Israeli prime minister by his brother. Yigal Amir is serving a life sentence for the assassination. Another co-conspirator, Dror Adani, completed his sentence in 2002.

Barak raps critics

Israeli Defense Minister Ehud Barak said the recent spate of criticism by former Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's "gang" on a possible attack on Iran's nuclear infrastructure has caused "damage" to Israel. Former Mossad chief Meir Dagan and former Shin Bet security agency chief Yuval Diskin said recently that Barak and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu were not fit to lead the country. Olmert called on the government to wait for sanctions to work instead of launching an attack. Barak told Israel Hayom that Olmert and his supporters "travel all over the world, and their remarks serve to weaken the not-inconsequential achievement of Israeli policy, which has turned the Iranian nuclear threat into an important and urgent issue, not only for Israel, but for the world at large."

Doggie daycare keeps hounds happy

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As the puppies play at Woof and Shloof in midtown Toronto, it's hard to say it's a dog-eat-dog world out there. None of the happy hounds look dog tired, there wasn't one who could claim to be sick as a dog, but, truth be told, it certainly looked like the place was going to the dogs.

But in a good way.

It turns out, today's pampered pooches never had it so good, what with the spa-like grooming services and doggie daycare at their convenience.

As people spend more and more on their canine companions, enter Woof and Shloof, a grooming, daycare and dog-training company located not far from Forest Hill. It bills itself as a "first-class facility [that] is cage free and architected entirely from the dog's point of view."

Jesse Sternberg, founder and owner of the 18-month-old company, believes he has hit on a winning formula that distinguishes Woof and Shloof (Yiddish for sleep) from other facilities catering to canines.

At the heart of it is his uncanny ability to see the world as dogs see it, to relate to them on their own level and to provide them with a stimulating and enjoyable experience that sees them return to their owners calm and peaceful.

It's something they appreciate, he said. The last thing many of them want to do is deal with a hyped-up hound that's been cooped up all day in a house or apartment.

Sternberg can relate to dogs because he's been around them all his life – he jokes he "was raised by a sheepdog" – and has learned to recognize and apply the non-verbal signals they use to communicate.

"I can do stuff other people can't do," he explained. "I can take a plate of food off your table and put it on the floor, and [the dog] wouldn't touch it – he'd wait for me to give it to him."

Through his own experience and by following the lead of renowned dog trainer Turid Rugaas, Sternberg communicates with animals through gestures and subtle signals.

"Dogs see us as part of the animal kingdom," he said. "They communicate non-verbally."

"Dogs come from a place where they avoid conflict, where they want to be peaceful," he continued. They avoid eye contact, which can be seen as a gesture of assertiveness.

Since he is sensitive to these hidden clues, Sternberg is able to create an environment in which as many as 30 dogs can socialize without conflict, play, get exercise and expend their energy. His staff is trained to employ his techniques, and his clients love the calmness in their animals when they pick them up at the end of the day. They usually come back for more.

"I'll get crazy, poorly behaved dogs at home, and after they come here, they go home and they're blissfully calm. The owners are amazed and they spread it around by word-of-mouth," Sternberg, 31, said.

"It's a huge part of my business because I have two customers every time someone comes into the store, the dog and the human."

As a result, the business has grown by leaps and bounds. In the 18 months since he opened, more than 1,300 customers have come through the doors. "Every month, the numbers are growing."

"We hit our break-even point," Sternberg said. "It took a while. It took 16 months. Since then, it's basically been exploding."

The April 2012 revenue numbers are triple what they were the same month the year before, he added.

Woof and Shloof's revenue model is based on selling packages for half-day or full-day daycare, as well as providing grooming services and training.

The hourly rate drops as larger packages are selected. A full day is priced at $39 to drop in; $33 a day for a package of 10, or $29 a day for a package of 20.

The competition can't match that value, Sternberg said, not when dog walkers charge $20 just for a one-hour walk.

"The best customers are the ones who are double-income earners who work long days and their dog is essentially their child," he said. "They feel guilty leaving the dog at home. Also, when a dog is left alone for that long, dogs tend to be destructive. They chew the couch and rip the baseboard. So this becomes a solution."

Egypt sued over pipeline disruptions

Ital Trilnick
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Shareholders in East Mediterranean Gas, the company that oversaw the now defunct Egyptian-Israeli natural gas deal, are suing the government of Egypt for violating three bilateral investment treaties, the company announced last week.

The decision to take legal action against the Egyptian government under treaties with the United States, Poland and Germany is the strongest move so far by the group, ensuring that the dispute will be handled diplomatically and not just commercially.

The investors, who include Thai energy giant PTT, U.S. businessman Sam Zell and Israel's Merhav, are also suing the Egyptian oil and gas companies. Together the plaintiffs are seeking up to $8 billion (all figures US) in damages.

Egyptian state-owned oil and gas companies announced April 22 that they were terminating gas sales to Israel, which were part of a 20-year deal, following a year of sabotage and pipeline attacks that had already disrupted supplies.

Israeli and Egyptian officials have tried to play down the ending of the 2005 deal, saying the cancellation of the contract supplying Israel with 40 per cent of its gas needs resulted from a business dispute. However, there have been growing public calls within Egypt to review ties with Israel since the overthrow of president Hosni Mubarak, for whom a peace treaty with Israel was a cornerstone of regional policy.

Announcement of the suit came after months of unsuccessful attempts to resolve the issue in negotiations, one of the shareholders, Ampal-American Israel Corp., said.

"The investors' disputes with Egypt arise out of a series of acts and failures by the government of Egypt that have seriously undermined the value of the investors' investments in EMG," Ampal said in a statement.

The pipeline had been targeted by terrorists in the Sinai peninsula numerous times, halting the flow of gas for most of the past year. Ampal has submitted a request for arbitration to the World Bank's International Center for Settlement of Investment Disputes in accordance with the Egyptian-U.S. bilateral treaty.

Israeli hotels offer enticing vacation packages

Steve Walz
Special to The CJN

Spurred by a record-breaking number of foreign tourists who visited the Holy Land during the first quarter of 2012, Israel's burgeoning hotel industry is gearing up for a busy summer tourism season by sprucing up facilities and offering a variety of exciting vacation packages.

According to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics, 752,000 foreign visitors entered the country between January and March 2012. That number eclipsed last year's figures by two per cent. The first-quarter figures also represent a one per cent increase over 2010, which Israel's Ministry of Tourism declared was Israel's best year ever for incoming tourism.

Despite the generally optimistic picture, many hotel managers aren't assuming that North American Jewish tourists will reflexively book a vacation to Israel, when there are a myriad of interesting destinations to choose from. In order to attract both veteran and new foreign tourists to their facilities, some of Israel's best-known hotels have undergone a series of-physical transformations in order to broaden their appeal, while others have focused on offering newfangled experiences to both couples and families with children.

"Both returning and new clientele are quite different from five years ago because of new technologies. Today's tourists are more computer savvy. They can compare prices online in an instant from their computers and make a formal booking from their smartphones, so hotels must be prepared to offer more personalized services, as well as new experiences," Ilan Brenner, the executive assistant manager of marketing and sales at the Inbal Hotel in Jerusalem, said.

"Our staff knows our clients, and in a growing number of cases, we have literally grown up with entire families. So when a new generation emerges, we already have a good idea about their needs. Both returning and new tourists are always searching for and asking about upgrades, so we are constantly adding incentives, whether it's a free car, a multimedia game room for youngsters, new spa treatments, trendy gastronomic experiences in the dining room, etc."

The Dan Hotel chain recently completed a makeover at its historical King David Hotel in Jerusalem and at its venerable Dan Carmel Hotel in Haifa. Rafi Beeri, the Dan Hotel's vice-president of marketing and sales, was enthused by the renovations, as well as the debut of a unique "hotel within a hotel" concept at the Dan Jerusalem (formerly the Hyatt Regency).

Beeri said, "We have invested heavily in upgrading these hotels in different ways. The King David has undergone a major makeover with a new section of rooms and suites. At the Dan Carmel, which debuted in 1962, we have completed a top-to-bottom renovation which includes new executive rooms, which overlook Haifa Bay and the Carmel Mountains. With the Dan Jerusalem, which we acquired in 2010, we realized that renovating this huge hotel [500 rooms] would have to be done in phases and feature some unique aspects."

Beeri said that with the Dan Jerusalem's unique "hotel within a hotel" concept, guests and groups can benefit from more personalized services and amenities. "It can be compared to an airline's business-class environment.

We've upgraded a wing of 120 rooms [executive class], where guests or groups who wish to stay in this section will enjoy a separate check-in area, separate lounge and dining facilities, as well as a special staff that will cater to them in a more personalized manner.

"In addition, as the Dan's chain is sponsoring Israel's ParaOlympics team this summer at the Olympic Games in London, our popular Danyland Kids Club will highlight Olympic-style sports activities for youngsters at many of our hotels."

The Ramada Jerusalem Hotel has acquired a stellar reputation among families with children who seek discounted long-term vacation packages (from seven to 21 days), with a variety of summer activities for adults and children. "Our annual We Love Kids summer program has been a hit with tourists from North America for several years," Yacov Shaari, the general manager of the Ramada Jerusalem Hotel, said.

The Rimonim in Eilat

"If people are staying in the hotel over an extended period, we have to keep the kids entertained, so every day we offer something different, whether it's a magician, petting zoo, etc. During weekdays, we offer complimentary shuttle-bus service to the Old City, which is an attraction for the parents. And, our outdoor American-style barbecues out by the pool area during August always attracts a large audience of both adults and children alike."

The growing Rimonim chain recently re-branded four of its upscale properties to create the "Royal Collection," which includes the Royal Dead Sea, Rimonim Eilat, Ruth Rimonim Safed and Rimonim Galei Kinnereth.

Anat Aharon, Rimonim's vice-president of sales and marketing, said, "During the summer months, the Royal Dead Sea will feature special spa packages that include the hotel's new Royal Lounge. The Royal Serenity Indulgence Package features both a private VIP spa and private beach opposite the hotel. There is also a summer spa getaway at the Rimonim Galei Kinnereth in Tiberias. Guests who book our Ben-Gurion Suite package are pampered with a deluxe treatment in the hotel's spa, unique amenities and special tastings of boutique Israeli wines upon arrival.

"At the nearby Ruth Rimonim in Safed (Tzfat), we invite guests to let their soul breathe amidst the mystic beauty of the hotel's Galilean surroundings. The hotel also features a wine cellar, where you can sample the best Israeli wines. The staff at the Ruth Rimonim can also organize special walking tours through the colourful alleys and art galleries in the Old City, accompanied by klezmer music. In Eilat, we are offering summer Serenity and Action packages to romantic couples and families with children who seek a bit of adventure."

At the Sheraton Tel Aviv Hotel, where North American, British and French tourists alike converge during the summer months, the accent will be on indulging kids and parents alike. "As a hotel, we are geared for families, providing dedicated areas for youngsters with computers, where they can connect with their friends on Facebook," said Jean-Louis Ripoche, the general manager of the Sheraton Tel Aviv. "Last year we opened a children's pool. This year, we will complement it with a guarded playground with games and toys, where families can relax and enjoy the pool, while their children are playing. We also are featuring our summer kids breakfast-buffet corner featuring a variety of yogurts, colourful cereals, a variety of chocolate drinks, pancakes, mini Belgian waffles, etc. There's also a kids menu on display at the outdoor pool.

"During the summer, we will be extending breakfast hours in the dining room till 12 p.m., so couples and families alike can enjoy a longer, relaxed morning. After breakfast, we offer adults a free bicycle, so they can pedal around the seaside boardwalk area and beyond."

In many instances, Israeli hotels have not increased their prices since last summer, as general managers are aware that the price of airline tickets has increased by as much as 15 to 20 per cent during the past few months, because of the inflated price of oil, and families are looking to maximize their vacation experience without blowing their budgets.

Keret's surreal stories tinged with sad realism

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Nothing is too far-fetched in the stories and characters that populate Etgar Keret's fantastic imagination.

A man gets transported back to his childhood; a woman unzips her boyfriend and finds another man lurking inside; a man keeps just about everything in his pocket, just in case someone asks him for something; a goldfish grants wishes, and a gumball machine can transport people to the land where all your lies come to life.

One short story even claims to be a unique Israeli innovation and the best story in the world.

Suddenly, a Knock on the Door (Farrar, Straus and Giroux) is the latest collection of stories by the popular Israeli writer.

Several of the stories deal with the art of writing itself – of inventing and creating words of make-believe.

The title story, for instance, is about a writer (named Keret) who is forced to tell a story at gunpoint to a bearded Swedish man in his living room.

This doesn't happen to Amos Oz or David Grossman, the narrator thinks, a tribute to other Israeli writers Keret is often compared to.

"Two people are sitting in a room," the writer begins saying nervously, "suddenly there's a knock on the door!" And sure enough, as happens in an Etgar Keret story, suddenly there is a knock on the door. In comes a pollster doing a survey who also pulls out a gun and demands that Keret tells him a story.

Eventually, there's another knock, and a pizza delivery boy also joins in the action demanding a story. When Keret (the character) begins telling them about his current plight, the Swede protests. "That's not a story. It's exactly what's happening here right now. Don't you go and dump reality on us like a garbage truck. Use your imagination, man, create, invent, take it all the way."

And take it all away is exactly what Keret, the author, does with these 35 short stories.

They're surreal and imaginative, yet at the same time tinged with slice-of-life realism and sadness.

One of the common themes in these stories is that of characters being drawn to invention and fiction in order to escape their own loneliness and alienation. Such is the case in Parallel Universes, in which a heartbroken, suicidal man imagines an alternate reality where nothing bad is happening to him.

This theme is also true of one of my favourites in this collection, Healthy Start. In it, Miron, a lonely widower, takes to going to a café for breakfast every morning. One day, a man sits at his table, mistakenly believing that Miron was somebody he was supposed to meet. Miron pretends he is that person and continues the conversation with him.

From then on, every morning, Miron pretends to be the person that other people made plans to meet with at the café – a blind date or a man who believes Miron is seducing his wife – and uses these situations to escape his own depressing life.

While many of the stories are light-hearted and humorous, some like Teamwork where a divorced father agrees to kill his son's babysitter, or in Polite Little Boy in which a young boy witnesses the impending dissolution of his parents' marriage, also have a dark side to them.

In a way, these stories explore all sides of human nature, from love, to lust, loneliness, regret, hatred and revenge.

People magazine says that Keret can do more with six strange and funny paragraphs than most writers can with 600 pages, and this is true. Most of these stories are under four pages long. The few longer ones, in fact, are the ones that don't work very well.

Born in 1967, Keret is one of the new breed of rising young artists coming out of Israel, and he's certainly one to keep a close eye on. He's been published in The New Yorker, Harper's and the New York Times. He's also an acclaimed film director and his first film, Jellyfish, won the Caméra d'Or prize at the Cannes festival in 2007.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

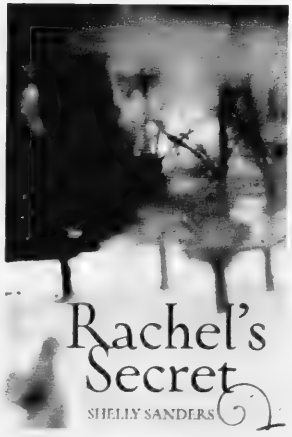
Powerful descriptions of pre-Revolutionary Russia

In Rachel's Secret (Second Story Press), the debut young readers novel by Toronto writer Shelly Sanders, the title character is a strong-willed teenage girl living in 1903 Kishinev, Russia.

Unlike most girls her age and in her time period, the 14-year-old Jewish girl wasn't interested in just growing up and becoming a wife and mother. She had dreams of becoming a journalist and maybe travelling the world.

As Passover approaches, Rachel's life is turned upside down when a Christian friend of hers is murdered in a park. The local newspaper whips up antisemitic fervour by making outrageous claims of blood libel and stating that the boy, Mikhail, was killed by Jews to make matzah.

As you'd expect, the hatred builds up to a boiling point and leads to an Easter Sunday pogrom in which Jewish businesses are torched and Jews beaten and some killed.



The story was inspired by Sanders' grandmother's life in pre-Revolutionary Russia.

The author's strength is her powerful description giving attention to the small details that vividly illustrate early 20th-century Russia. The coachman's tall black hat, for instance, is described as a stovepipe.

Her simple description of a boy Sergei drinking tea shows the unique Russian way of sucking the drink through a sugar cube held between the teeth.

This powerful and educational story, geared toward teenage readers, continues Second Story Press' strong tradition of publishing books with strong female characters for teenagers and young adults.

Jewish Film Festival continues until May 13

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Judging by the dizzying variety of movies, this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, a major cultural event in the city, is bound to satisfy a diverse audience.

Toby Perl Freilich's Inventing Our Life: The Kibbutz Experiment is a comprehensive account of an iconic Israeli institution, the agricultural commune, the first of which was founded a little more than a century ago by eastern European pioneers dedicated to building a socialist state in what was then Ottoman Palestine.

In the century since then, many kibbutzim have changed tremendously. The outmoded notion of collective child care has fallen by the wayside. The central dining room has been phased out. Industry is more important than agriculture. Differential salaries and private housing are now the norm. Privatization has taken hold as the strict principle of egalitarianism has withered.

As Freiluch suggests, the kibbutz had no alternative but to change with the times. Modern capitalist Israel outgrew the kibbutz, and the traditional kibbutz model no longer fit the country.

Originally founded to provide employment for Jewish pioneers, the kibbutz played an integral role before and after Israel's creation. Kibbutzniks were in the forefront of establishing Israel's future borders. Their crops fed an expanding population. To a large degree, they produced the officer corps of the armed forces.

Freilich examines four kibbutzim: Degania, the first kibbutz; Sasa, the first kibbutz populated by American immigrants; Ein Shemer and Hulda.

Their tough and resilient founders, braving malaria, hunger and Arab raids and lacking such essentials as electricity and running water, sought to build the prototype of the new, fighting Jew. "We felt we were the elite of Israeli society," says one grizzled veteran.

Begin's churlish attitude was the least of their problems. A debt crisis in the 1980s, endemic mismanagement and the continued flight of young members placed the kibbutz in jeopardy. Kibbutzim, however, appear to have weathered these challenges.

Arnon Goldfinger's The Flat delves into a family mystery. When Gerda Tuchler died, her descendants, including the filmmaker, sifted through her possessions in her Tel Aviv flat. To their surprise, they found copies of Der Angriff, a Nazi newspaper founded by Joseph Goebbels, and letters in German attesting to an unusual friendship.

Tuchler and her husband, Kurt, were German Jews who settled in Palestine after the rise of Adolf Hitler. Shortly after their arrival, they travelled around Palestine with Leopold von Mildenstein – a nobleman and high-ranking Nazi party member who had come to Palestine to write pro-Zionist stories about its Jewish inhabitants – and his wife. Stranger still, the Tuchlers regularly visited the von Mildensteins in Germany after the war.

Golfer paying his dues on minor league tour

Dustin Pollack
Special to The CJN

Ben Silverman remembers going to the driving range with his dad, Howard, as a 10-year-old, but it wasn't until he was 14 that he really got hooked on golf.

During a visit with his grandparents in Vancouver one summer, he decided to try a one-week junior golf clinic.

"The first four days were all about putting, chipping and hitting balls, but then when we got out onto the golf course on the last day, I realized all the different intricacies of the game, how difficult it was and how many different aspects to it there were. That's what drew me to it," Silverman said.

Today, the 24-year-old is playing on the Golfslinger.com Tour, formerly the Minor League Golf Tour in Florida, a training ground for PGA hopefuls. At the Abaco April Open, Silverman finished tied for 13th after shooting a 71. He earned $155.84 (all figures US). The winner took home $1,000. At the April Lake Worth Open a week later, Silverman shot a 70 and tied for seventh, earning $201.25.

Most recently, Golfslinger.com reported, Silverman received a $1,000 bonus as the leading money winner over a two-week period in April, with $2,651.25. Most of it, $2,000, came from winning a 36-hole tournament at Fountains Country Club in Lake Worth. The bonus period also included four 18-hole events. He tied for seventh in a Golfslinger.com Tour event at the Evergreen Club.

Silverman knows there are no guarantees on his road to the PGA, but that isn't stopping him from pursuing his dream.

"It's just I've realized once you get to a really good level how long it takes to slowly climb the ladder and get better and better," Silverman said. "It takes a lot of time, because the guys at the top are really, really good.

"I feel I'm good enough, and I'm getting better each day. I'm just going to go for it full on, and I'm not thinking about what might happen by the time I'm 30. I'm just all for right now."

Ben Silverman

When he was a youngster, golf was just another sport Silverman was good at. He played a lot of sports, but when he got back to Toronto from Vancouver, all he wanted to do was be on the course. He quit hockey – a sport he had played competitively – and when he was 16 he joined the Vaughan Secondary School golf team. By the time he was a senior in high school, Silverman, who had been named the school's athlete of the year, had quit the baseball and basketball teams so he could dedicate more time to golf.

His time on the course paid off. He was accepted to Florida Atlantic University, where he played on the schools' Division I golf team.

Making the jump to being a pro is another matter. It's not just his talent or the skills of his competitors that he has to worry about. Beyond playing well in tournaments, Silverman also has to earn enough money to be able to travel and pay tournament entry fees. The entry fee for a one-day tournament at the minor-league level is around $250. A two-day tournament costs $450. If he wants to compete at a higher level in the minor leagues, entry fees can run upward of $1,000. Silverman has to rely on caddying and private lessons as well as tournament winnings and some financial support from his parents to help pay his way.

"Some friends I know are lucky enough to meet an investor who wanted to set up a deal to try and give them money," he said. "That's the part of the minor league game – the money issue – that a lot of people don't know about, which makes it difficult to climb the ladder.

"If you don't have money, you pretty much just have to wait until the PGA Tour tryouts at the end of the year."

Silverman tried out for the PGA Tour for the first time last year. He made it through the pre-qualifying stage by finishing 15th in a three-day tournament, but he was eliminated in the first of three stages in the qualifying tournament.

Even though he was unable to take the next step at the PGA Tour tryouts, he isn't putting a timeline on his career, and he still has high hopes for his future in golf.

"I'm looking forward to trying out for the Canadian Open this summer. I'm coming home to Toronto to qualify for that. I'd also like to try out for the Canadian Tour, and tryouts for that are in California in about a month.

"I'm 24 now, and my goal is to be at least on the Nationwide Tour [which feeds players into the PGA Tour] in the next three years and hopefully on the PGA Tour by the time I'm 29 or 30."

Maccabi Canada rounds out hockey coaching staff

Compiled by CJN Staff

The coaching staff for Maccabi Canada's men's hockey team is set.

Greg Gilbert and Mike Pelino have been named assistants to head coach Mike Keenan.

Gilbert won Stanley Cups as a player with the New York Islanders and New York Rangers. He has coached in the NHL with the Calgary Flames, and was recently named OHL Coach of the Year for his work with the Saginaw Spirit.

Pelino has coached in the NHL with Florida and New York, and is the current head coach of the Peterborough Petes in the Ontario Hockey League (OHL). Pelino has also coached Team Canada at the World Junior Championships and the World Championships, and was an assistant with the gold-medal-winning team at the 2002 Salt Lake Winter Olympics.

"There are NHL teams that would be envious of a coaching staff like this," said Team Canada hockey chair Mark Goodman. "I can't say enough about the staff that Mike Keenan and GM Alex Voihanski have put together."

The Maccabi Games, also known as the Jewish Olympics, take place every four years in Israel, and feature more than 9,000 athletes. Hockey competition will take place in July 2013 in the northern city of Metulla.

Tryouts for the hockey team will be held in Montreal on May 25 and 26 at Bonaventure Arena and in Toronto on June 8 to 10 at Pavilion Arena.

In his riveting film, Goldfinger tries to make sense of this seemingly bizarre relationship, questioning his incurious mother, talking to von Mildenstein's daughter (who claims he was not a Nazi) and interviewing historians.

Evi Kurz's The Kissinger Saga takes Henry Kissinger and his lesser-known brother, Walter, back to Fuerth, their hometown in Germany, on a sentimental journey. "We still feel connected to Fuerth," says Henry, probably speaking more for himself than Walter who, unlike Henry, never speaks in German.

Like their late parents, Louis and Paula, the Kissinger brothers were born in Fuerth, a town of half-timbered buildings in the state of Franconia from which Kurz also hails.

In this competently crafted documentary, Henry and Walter recall their childhood, the rise of Nazism, the humiliations they endured, their parents' lives, their emigration in 1938, their new home in New York's Washington Heights enclave and the adjustments Louis and Paula had to make to survive.

Kurz hardly dwells on Henry's dazzling career as an academic and diplomat, nor on Walter's career as a businessman. The brothers, particularly Walter, couch their comments in careful, measured language, indicating they have not forgotten their German roots.

Fabienne Rousso-Lenoir's Cabaret-Berlin. The Wild Scene explores the nightclub and theatre scene of 1920s and early 1930s Berlin, a mecca of modernism in which German Jews played a pivotal role. Composed of jaunty film clips and revelling in cutting anti-authoritarian humour, the film moves along to the beat of catchy tunes, features a tableau of sexy chorus girls and gives a viewer tantalizing glimpses of the future Hollywood actor Peter Lorre and of an alluring performer named Marlene Dietrich.

Lisa Ohlin's melancholy feature film, Simon and the Oaks, takes place in late 1930s and 1940s Sweden as Europe edges closer to war.

After a fire engulfs the Lentov home, Simon's mother, Karin (Helen Sjoholm), invites Isak to stay with them indefinitely. Isak's father, Ruben (Jan Josef Liefers), a prosperous bookstore owner, gratefully accepts her invitation.

These events occur as Germany invades Poland and Norway, imbuing the film with an ominous tone. Can neutral Sweden be next? Further layers of uncertainty pop up when family secrets are revealed and Simon discovers his real identity. Simon and the Oaks is a film of stark simplicity and depth.

William Karel and Livia Manera's Roth on Roth offers the great American novelist Philip Roth a platform to reflect on his life. Although Roth is notoriously reclusive, he opens up here, discussing his family, novels and anxieties.

He defends his first published story, Defender of the Faith, from charges of self-hating antisemitism. He remembers he could not converse with his grandfather, who spoke not a word of English. He admits he annoyed his father when he chose writing over law. He talks about his hellish first marriage. He discloses he had to "prepare" his parents for the publication of Portnoy's Complaint, which made him financially stable. He discusses his disciplined work habits and acknowledges he is unhappy when not working. He says he faces the prospect of death with fear, sadness and resignation.

Stephen Fischler and Joel Sucher's Dressing America – Tales from the Garment Center comes off as an ode to New York City's fabled and fiercely competitive ready-to-wear rag trade, which was founded and nurtured by Jewish immigrants in the late 19th century.

Manufacturers liken the garment district to a small town, where bumping into a familiar face is a common experience. The filmmakers claim that the industry, built on bolts of cloth, has managed to adapt to changes in taste. Surprisingly, they say precious little about the formidable challenge posed by Asian competitors.

Paula Markovitch's The Prize is a feature film set in 1970s or 1980s Argentina, when the army-backed government was conducting a "dirty war" against the left. The movie is infinitely sombre and bleak.

A mother and her young daughter live in a simple cabin amid the wind-swept sand dunes of a lonely stretch of beach. They seem like castaways in purgatory.

The mother, taciturn and monosyllabic, is secretive, as if some disaster looms on the horizon. She has reason to be tense. Her husband has disappeared, presumably having been arrested and perhaps even murdered.

Before Cecelia sets off to school, she is told by her insecure mother what to say to the teacher. And when Cecilia, a bright girl, wins an essay contest sponsored by the armed forces, her mother is mortified, insisting she boycott the award ceremony.

The Prize is short on character development, and the back story is vague. But the atmosphere is thick and enveloping.

As a parent, it must be frustrating to see your children struggle with their homework and not get the marks they deserve. But you are probably too tired to sit patiently and teach them effectively after a full day of work. However there is a solution. As a certified teacher with a PhD in education, I can significantly improve your child's grade. Furthermore, while I can teach any middle school or high school subject, as well as any Hebrew subject (incl. bar/bat mitzvah), essay writing is a specialty of mine. I am also the only tutor who guarantees his work. For a short while, I will be taking on students for private tutoring. Call 416-398-9511 for more info.

Tough training doesn't faze prospective RCMP officer

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Bonnie Phillips has spent the better part of the last two years chasing her career dream. But Phillips' dream is not your average career: she hopes to join the RCMP.

"I'm actually doing this, I can't believe it," said Phillips, 23, of her recent acceptance to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) training program.

After graduating from forensic sciences at the University of Toronto's Mississauga campus, she dedicated her time to preparing for the long, multi-stage tests that would eventually allow her to join the RCMP. The tests included a written assessment, an interview, a psychological assessment, a lie detector test and a test of physical fitness.

Phillips said that because the application process took so long, and there were so many stages, she kept pretty quiet about it, not wanting to get herself and her friends excited about something that she wasn't sure would materialize.

"I was just looking at it like 'I just have to pass this next step,'" she said.

It was about two months ago, after spending extra hours in the gym with a trainer to prepare for her final physical test, that Phillips found out she had been accepted and would be leaving to Regina for intensive training in mid-April. "I'm completely excited," she told The CJN a few days before leaving.

Wearing the uniform of the RCMP was not always on Phillips' list of goals, but in her third year of university that quickly changed. She attended a career fair for federal government jobs, where she learned about the more than 300 specialties you can choose from after completing two years of policing.

Phillips realized that joining the RCMP would allow her to put her forensic psychology studies to good use. "When they were talking about it [at the career fair], it sounded perfect," she said.

When she told her family of her plans, they were supportive, if a bit intrigued. "They were like, 'OK, that sounds interesting,'" Phillips said with a laugh.

Now, they couldn't be more excited for her. Her family has been jokingly referring to her training as a master's program because of all the work they know lies ahead.

"Getting in is one thing, but passing the training is another step," Phillips said. Phillips has joined about 32 other new RCMPers-to-be in her training troupe.

The men and women, many of whom are quite a bit older than Phillips and pursuing a second career, will be doing six months of paramilitary training, supplemented with mounds of homework and assignments. "They call it a constant job interview – everything you do has to be a pass," she said.

But the tough training isn't enough to scare Phillips away. She said she is eager to meet the many different types of people brought together by the RCMP.

Phillips knows she is likely to be one of the only Jewish women there, even though the trainees are coming from all different walks of life.

However, despite the lower number of Jewish people in the RCMP, during her interview process, Phillips met the first female Jewish officer in the RCMP by pure chance. Fran Saltzman is not only an RCMP officer, but also a rabbi's wife. Meeting Saltzman helped Phillips realize she would not be alone as a female Jew in the RCMP.

In addition to meeting new people, Phillips is also excited to get involved with sports teams and the band, two of her many hobbies.

Throughout university, she made an effort to play pretty much any sport available to her.

"I dabbled in every sport because they always needed girls," she said, remembering her eagerness to learn sports she had never played before, like lacrosse.

Phillips also plays flute, trumpet and guitar in her spare time. When she heard about the athletic and musical opportunities that would be available to her in the RCMP, it made the idea of training in Regina even better.

"It kind of fits all my interests," she said. "It's kind of perfect."

Though Phillips lived on her own in residence in Mississauga, she said moving to Regina will be an even greater level of independence. While she knows she'll miss her family and friends, she thinks the temporary move will be good for her.

After training, she will eventually be placed to serve in another part of Canada.

Phillips has already been told that she won't be able to serve in Ontario or Quebec, and she is hoping that she will be sent to either the West or East Coast when the time comes.

But for now, she's focused on her journey to Regina, the first step along a rewarding career path.

From there, she said, she'll be able to move forward with her goals in the RCMP.

"I'm kind of excited for the adventure."

Cohabitation vs. marriage

Dear Ella,

My granddaughter Megan, a bright and beautiful 25-year-old, has been dating Carey for the past year. They have recently finished school and have started new careers.

They are ready to move on to Phase 2 of their relationship: cohabitation. Now that they both have an income, they can move out of their parents' homes and afford to rent something modest.

When I asked Megan why she wanted to live with Carey instead of getting married, she looked at me like I had two heads.

"It's a test, Bubbie, to see if we are compatible for marriage. Everyone lives together first." She was so excited about this new venture I didn't have the heart to burst her bubble.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

I'm not old-fashioned, but I don't believe that living together before marriage is a good test to see if a couple is compatible. It somehow blurs the lines of commitment. There are far better ways to tell if the person you are with is the right one.

I don't want Megan to make a mistake that will cost her years of her life. Am I wrong?

Bummed-out Bubbie

Dear Bummed-out Bubbie,

Many people, like Megan, feel that living together is the first step to take before committing to marriage. You get to see how grumpy your partner is in the morning, how messy they leave the bathroom sink, and how they handle day-to-day finances and regular household chores. But does that prepare them for a lasting marriage?

Statistics show that the majority of young adults in their 20s will live with a romantic partner at least once, and more than half of all marriages will be preceded by cohabitation.

It usually starts quite innocently. You date, you spend more time at each other's homes, and then you move to regular sleepovers. The next natural and most convenient step is to move in together. But there are pros and cons to cohabitation before marriage. Living together does allow you to "try it on" before making the final purchase. Does it suit you? Is it a good fit? Does it bring out the best in you? Is it trendy or something that will never grow old?

Living together as a test can also backfire. Often couples will get comfortable in a cohabitation lifestyle, and you're right when you say this can blur the lines of commitment for some. When two people vow to stand under a chupah before God, family and friends, there's something very solid about that as a commitment versus simply saying, "Let's move in together."

There's a more lax attitude that comes with living together. It allows you to think you can leave easily, but once you've melded your finances, bought furniture, enjoy the same friends and invested so much time in each other, you may feel it's easier to just get married than to start all over.

It's hard to get young people to listen. Growing up means making decisions, even if some of them end up being mistakes. Your job as her bubbie is to be there for her no matter what. You can certainly help by offering articles, books and statistics, but in the end, Megan will do what she feels is best. Either way, there are no guarantees.

At the first annual Jerusalem Post Conference in New York, former prime minister Ehud Olmert says Israel shouldn't seek Palestinian recognition of a Jewish state in peace negotiations.

Prof. Efraim Inbar, left, director of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies (BESA), based at Bar-Ilan University, says that an air strike on Iran's nuclear enrichment facilities is the appropriate action. He said it should be carried out "in the medium term."

Israel provokes moving memories

It never fails. Whenever I visit Israel, something happens that evokes powerful memories and associations. A trip with a UJA mission last fall, my 10th with this group, was no exception.

This association was very powerful and reminded me of the reactions I often see in my older patients when they recount events that bring back memories that are profound and emotionally overwhelming.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

One experience in particular triggered enormous emotion in me. I was attending the recently opened Eichmann trial exhibition at Jerusalem's Yad Vashem. The guide, an expert historian on this period of history, was explaining a display of pictures of the many prosecution witnesses used to recount the hideous crimes of Adolf Eichmann. I saw a name and picture at the right lower part of the exhibit that I recognized. It was of Dr. Aharon Peretz, an obstetrician-gynecologist who had a profound impact on my life. He was my teacher and mentor during my first visit to Israel as a medical student in the 1960s.

As his student at the Rambam Hospital in Haifa, I observed his enormous skill as a physician but more importantly, his empathy for the female Holocaust survivors that he examined in order for them to claim German reparations. After attending the special clinic devoted to this population where he signed every affidavit in the affirmative, confirming that their obstetrical and gynecological problems resulted from their Holocaust experience, I asked him if all their problems could be attributed to those experiences. He answered as he looked at me with pain and sympathy, "Yes, all of them, every one of them."

I finished a month in his service. He allowed me to assist at almost every procedure he did, which was very exciting – to be the first assistant to a highly skilled surgeon as a medical student was astonishing. When I left, I told him I would love to return, and his farewell to me was very emotional. Due to a confluence of circumstances surrounding my final oral examination in midwifery (as it was called in my medical school in Dundee, Scotland), I received a prize that allowed me to return to Israel six months after I finished the first half of my Scottish internship.

The departmental chief had an interest in history. He asked me to explain why I had a Scottish name. With 10 minutes for the oral examination, I spoke of the influence of a famous Scottish mercenary general who fought for Czar Peter the Great. In recognition of the mercenary's success, two shtetls in Lithuania acknowledged his prominence and many Jewish inhabitants took Gordon as their family named rather than the typical "-ovich" as the end of the father's first name.

The professor seemed enchanted, and after I finished the 10-minute oral, he gave me top marks and, as a result, a 500-pound prize, which I used to return to Rambam and Prof. Peretz for a five-month internship.

It was then I learned indirectly of his fame as a witness at the Nuremberg trial, but I did not realize until last year's trip that he was also a key witness at the Eichmann trial. Looking at his picture at the bottom of the large display revived all the emotion of my time with him and reminded me that it was partly his influence that resulted in my returning to Israel and ultimately moving there in the late 1960s. It was one of the combinations of moving memories that one internalizes forever.

Myths and realities of retirement-home living

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

We asked a number of retirement homes about the myths surrounding retirement-home living. Following are some replies from a select group of local retirement homes.

Lisa Ludmer, director of sales and marketing, Kensington Place Retirement Residence and Living Life On The Avenue Retirement Residence

Myth: Retirement Residences are filled with sick, old people sitting around or sleeping. Hallways and rooms smell of urine, hospital-type food is served and entertainment consists of a weekly movie and a weekly concert. A retirement home is a place where people grow older and deteriorate faster. It's a depressing environment for family and friends to visit.

Reality: Kensington Place Retirement Residence and Living Life on the Avenue are bright, clean, happy places where active seniors live together to share in physical, social and intellectual activities. Lectures, fitness classes, entertainment and outings allow residents to maintain a busy lifestyle. Delicious, healthy food is served in a beautiful dining room, where friends and family can join as guests.

Danny Joseph, VIVA Thornhill Woods Retirement Community

Myth: Most people envision repetitive menus and bland food, served in dining rooms where people are forced to sit in the same seat with the same people at the same time every day.

Reality: Our VIVAlicious approach to dining aims to ensure our community members are eating food that is both nutritious and delicious. Three meals daily are freshly prepared by our executive chef and culinary team, meals made with fresh ingredients, including some picked from our on-site Victory Garden, and from recipes that have been selected with the assistance of a certified senior health dietician. VIVA's open seating concept enables community members to dine with friends or enjoy a quieter meal with a good book. Providing choice is at the heart of what we do, so VIVA offers a lengthy à la carte menu in addition to two or three specials at each meal. At our VIVA Thornhill Woods Retirement Community, we offer Jewish-style dining with meat provided from a kosher supplier.

Reality: VIVA's retirement communities are vibrant, dynamic and very social. We provide an inspiring range of amenities to suit any lifestyle, such as an indoor heated saltwater pool, bistro-style café, fully-licensed pub, big-screen movie theatre, and a garden – just to name a few. Our purpose at VIVA is "making today great"! We do this by surrounding our community members with caring team members and an enriching environment that gives them a renewed sense of purpose and fulfilment.

A retirement residence for everyone

For anyone who hasn't stepped into a retirement community since they visited their own grandparents in an "elderly home" decades ago, VIVA Retirement Communities will transform their perception and they will realize just how wonderful retirement living can be. The new reality of retirement living is light years apart from the idea many carry from experiences they had with their own family members years ago.

Myth: Retirement residences are unaffordable.
Reality: We help you make a list of monthly expenses such as heating, electricity, gas, insurance, water, taxes, house repairs, entertainment, groceries and exercise fees. It really does add up! Preparing three meals a day can be stressful and take a real toll on your health, not to mention the waste when you shop and cook for one. You throw out more than you eat! Gardening, house repairs and snow removal are far too much work for seniors, and the cost associated with those services can be daunting. Once people review these expenses, they realize they will be better off financially at Canterbury Place

Myth: I will lose my independence at a retirement residence and my health will continue to decline.
Reality: We see it all the time – seniors not managing very well on their own, forgetting medications, taking the wrong medication etc. The burden often falls on family members. At Canterbury Place, we have a nurse practitioner on site, as well as a registered nurse, physiotherapy, massage therapy, social programs, exercise classes and brain gym. What a difference all of this extra care makes to the senior. Families are noticing their loved ones are more fit, both emotionally and physically.

Myth: Downsizing from my home is too overwhelming and stressful.
Reality: We can help with that. We work with several organizations that specialize in downsizing and de-cluttering. As part of our early bird move-in initiative, we will pay for that service and have everything arranged in a new suite while new residents are enjoying a delicious hot meal in our dining room.

Lee Wine, Amica at Thornhill

Reality: This, of course, depends on many personal factors, however, the fact is, when you consider current living expenses such as utility bills, the cost and time of arranging for outside services to come in to help with housekeeping or activities, food, entertainment and getting to and from social activities, you would be surprised how quickly those expenses add up! There are many hidden costs that over the course of a year can change or increase as your needs change. So take the time to review your true cost of living, then look at an all-inclusive retirement lifestyle that is more affordable and manageable than you think. Amica at Thornhill provides potential residents with an understanding of the all-inclusive cost and surprising affordability of living in our beautiful community. With a wide variety of suite sizes and prices from which to choose, we are able to provide options to meet your needs, expectations and budget.

Delmanor Northtown

Myth: If I move to a retirement residence, I cannot keep my pet.
Reality: At Delmanor Northtown, we've always known how impossible it would be to leave one home for another without bringing that all-important family member: your pet. That could mean years of missing out on enjoying life without the drudgery of housekeeping chores and being part of a residence of people having too much fun to act retired. From the very beginning, we've made a point of welcoming pets as well behaved as yours so that you can experience life at Delmanor Northtown as soon as you'd like. After all, we know

L'chaim Retirement Homes

Myth: A retirement residence won't help my parent's dementia. It will only get worse regardless of where she's living.
Reality: That's not necessarily true. At L'chaim, we've achieved amazing results with the Montessori methods for dementia. While dementia is by definition a progressive disease, there are some non-pharmaceutical approaches that can slow its progress and compensate for loss of cognitive ability. Many of our residents, 80 per cent of whom have dementia, have achieved amazing results with this method. Resident Evelyn Sher was able to speak and respond after three years of being non-verbal.

Deborah Goldshaw, Marketing Manager, Constantia Retirement Residence

Myth: I'll lose my freedom and independence in a retirement home.
Reality: One of the fears commonly associated with moving into a retirement residence is the loss of freedom and independence. At Constantia, the reverse is true. Your life will change – for the better. With no housecleaning or cooking obligations, you'll have more freedom and time for your preferred activities and hobbies and more quality time with family. Our residents are not giving up their life, they're taking it back – and celebrating their newfound independence!

Myth: I'll lose my independence in a retirement home.
Reality: We encourage people to be independent as long as possible. Hazelton Place is in a perfect location for walks, shopping, theatre and art galleries. There are taxis outside our door. We also keep people busy with stimulating activities such as book clubs and bridge. We have a recreation department that encourages input from residents.

You're not far from your ideal kitchen

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

When it comes to kitchens, some things never go out of style. One of those things is good organization.

Marianna Keselman, creative director at Gliding Shelf Solutions (905-553-7895, 1-877-895-9766, glidingshelf.ca), said that an effectively organized kitchen can save a lot of time and space.

"You're not shifting and moving things to find something in the back," she said, explaining that the pull-out shelves that Gliding Shelf Solutions installs into existing cabinetry help people to make the most of their space, and to keep their kitchen environment uncluttered. The shelves fully extend, so people can see the entire contents of the cupboard at once.

Keselman said that she often sees seniors as well as new mothers who are looking to make their kitchens more accessible. Another group of people flocking to Gliding Shelf Solutions are baby boomers who are downsizing their houses into condominiums, where "every inch of space is prime real estate."

She explained that the pull-out shelves create more shelf space in a single cupboard, making the most of a small kitchen.

According to Keselman, gliding shelves help to spruce up a kitchen without the hassle or the cost of a full renovation.

"Some of the kitchen cabinets have good bones. It's a shame sometimes to demolish them," she said.

But for those people who are more than ready to get rid of old cabinets, the latest trend in kitchen cupboards is off-white. Manny Y, the interior designer at LogArt kitchen manufacturers (905-709-2722, www.logart.ca), said that most of his customers have been leaning toward lighter cabinets, with about half preferring to add a glaze to the cabinet doors, giving them a more traditional look.

Manny suggested that in kitchens with an island, it's a good idea to keep the island in dark wood, contrasting the off-white cabinets. "That will give a lot of character to the kitchen," he said.

He added that it's best to go with solid wood, because it will make the cabinets last for decades. When it comes to countertops, Manny recommends granite or quartz, "absolutely not laminate," he said, explaining that laminate countertops are no longer in style.

Because LogArt manufactures its cabinetry on site, and also does full renovations, there is a lot of choice for kitchen-hungry customers.

Manny, who has been in the kitchen manufacturing business since 1976, said it's important to know your budget and how much renovation you are willing to do.

With a lot of careful planning, some good organization and some helpful advice about the latest styles in kitchen design, you could be just a few steps away from whipping together a meal in your dream kitchen.

Your parents helped you cross the street safely, learn to ride a bike and drive a car

New heights in elegance with RISE Condominiums

Laura Fixman
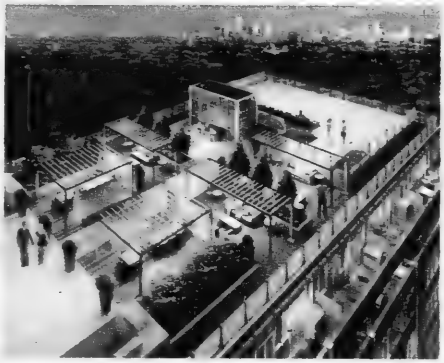
Special to the CJN

St. Clair West has become an attractive location for young professionals who want to move back into the neighbourhood where they grew up and those who want luxury and easy access by car, by subway or on foot to all that the city has to offer.

RISE Condominums at the south-east corner of Bathurst Street and St. Clair Avenue (416-546-7399, risecondos@bakersales.info) provides them with the opportunity to do just that.

The condos, by Reserve Properties, offer a long list of amenities including an infinity pool that spans the width of the building, an outdoor terrace connected to intimate dining and lounge spaces, an exercise studio and an entertainment area.

"We created a project that would make you feel like you're going to a five-star resort when you go home at night," said Shelley Fenton, president of Reserve Properties.



Another aspect of RISE Condominiums designed with luxury in mind was the grand lobby. Geometric shapes are sculpted throughout, furniture and wall textures combine industrial and organic materials, and contemporary chandeliers add to a building design that evokes a luxurious, world-class welcome.

Fenton said the neighbourhood's active outdoor lifestyle and value for green space – the area is home to boutiques, bakeries and restaurants as well as a nearby park – were taken into account in the building's contemporary courtyard garden with sculpture and water features.

"Everything comes together great," he said. "The architecture, the varying suite sizes and the amenities work together to make it fit into the neighbourhood."

The building is also appealing because of its great views in any direction, he said, and the architecture was designed with the natural views in mind.

This project has a personal significance for Fenton, which he said made it special.

"This is my backyard. I grew up there for 54 years," Fenton said. "My son and daughter were a part of this project, and it was great to share that experience with them and give back to the community I grew up in."

With studios, one- and two-bedroom suites ranging from 437 square feet to 865 square feet starting in the mid-$200,000, Felton said that since the condos are affordable, there has been a great response.

The sales centre opened in late November 2011, and 230 units were sold in the first four months. Fenton said the positive response indicates that they were right in thinking there was a need for condos in the area.

"The most important thing is that there's a strong need for quality condominium units," Fenton said. "We decided... to give RISE a high-end feeling so it brings this neighbourhood into the spotlight."

For more information about RISE Condominiums, visit the sales centre at 501 St. Clair Ave. W. or go to www.risecondos.com.

Adenat does more than build

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

It's hard to categorize Adenat Homes. Sure, the company is heavily involved in real estate – but that only tells a bit of the story.

From home sales and rentals to custom kitchens and pretty well everything else related to property, Adenat has things covered.

"It's an integration of all of the different parts that makes Adenat what it is," said Adenat founder Israel Schwartz.

With a sizable footprint in the Toronto area, up to Huntsville; South Florida, Israel and Paris, Adenat does more than just build homes.

And because of the amount of work Adenat has in selling and renting properties, there are always people on staff who are able to get things done.

Cheryl Berger

"We always have electricians and handymen and snow-removal people on hand," Schwartz said. "It's not really a problem for us to come to your property because we are already in your neighbourhood."

Specializing in custom homes as well as custom kitchens and cabinets seems to be a perfect combination for Adenat.

"When you buy a place, if you are looking to add a kitchen after that, it could be nine months until it's even ready for you to use in your house," Schwartz said. "You don't want that.

"But when you do it through us, we can start it right away, so it's all ready at the same time."

"When you see Adenat, you don't just see a landlord of many rental apartments, or a developer, or a kitchen-maker or a bricklayer," Schwartz said. "You see a full, complete package, with an amazing broker and agents with integrity."

The "amazing broker" he refers to is Cheryl Berger, who, like the company she works for, is quite multi-faceted and talented.

Schwartz considers Berger, who has worked at a law firm and is educated in interior decorating and design, to be the multi-faceted broker who gives his company an edge.

Berger, an Osgoode Hall Law School graduate and real estate lawyer, is able to work on all aspects of the process from start to finish, leaving Schwartz to focus on purchasing and developing.

And with that, the founder of Adenat – which was named for two of his oldest children, Adena and Nathan – has some big plans for a popular Jewish area.

"I own 1.2 acres of land on Wilson, by Bathurst, at the Highway 401 exit," Schwartz said. "I'm likely looking to develop that land as condominiums or old-age homes, but also to put up a hotel of at least 140 rooms."

This hotel, which would still be a while in the making, would service a location that doesn't have anything else currently in place.

"There's no hotel in the area that a frum family can walk to and from shul," Schwartz said. "Going up to Sheppard and then down to Lawrence, it's a very Orthodox area."

As an observant Jew himself, Schwartz is aware of how difficult it can be when trying to have a simchah in the area.

"If you keep Shabbat, there's no way to do a bar mitzvah or bris or wedding within that area, because there's no single place to host that many guests," Schwartz said. "People are scattered at dozens of homes."

Schwartz has a number of ideas for the hotel that he plans to run with.

"Things such as Shabbat elevators, separate swimming pools, a large enough kosher facility, all of those things," he said. "They have that in Brooklyn and in Israel, of course, but not yet here."

And given the burgeoning population of young Orthodox Jews in the area, a new condo would fill a need.

"It's almost impossible for new buyers [in that area] in the Orthodox community," Schwartz said. "Even a tiny bungalow these days goes for $800,000."

Adenat can be found online at www.adenathomes.com. Its real estate brokerage can be reached at 416-785-8555, while Adenat Cabinets Inc. is available at 416-784-4440 and the custom homes direct line is 416-633-3833.

Outdoor living trends for the summer

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

Utilizing outdoor space wisely is more important than ever, as families look to escape in their own backyards. According to a survey done by the American Institute for Architects, the demand for outdoor renovations has increased greatly over the last few years.

Dave Reburn, the owner of Deck & Dock, an outdoor furniture company serving Toronto for over 15 years with a 16,000-square-foot showroom at 1200 Castlefield Ave. (416-781-4887, deckanddock.ca), said he is seeing a lot more people transform their patios into living spaces.

"What we're seeing a lot of is creating an outdoor room, complete with a fire pit or barbeque, and outdoor sectional seating," Reburn said.

Some of the biggest trends for 2012 are fire pits and lighting with LEDs and fluorescents, a cost-effective and eco-friendly way of lighting your outdoor patio, and more built-in seating areas.

"In the last few years, we have seen a change. Instead of sticking to one material for outdoor furniture, now almost all of the suppliers we work with will use a combination of materials, such as woven and stainless, or woven and teak," Reburn said.

For families who want to re-do their spaces without spending a lot of money, he said, there are many affordable choices. "We have some families who come to us, and they don't want something disposable, but they're in their early 30s, they have just purchased a house, so they will pick something a little more moderate which they can upgrade in a few years."

For those families, Reburn recommends Deck & Dock's "backyard bargains," a selection that offers new designs, in fabrics that are quality products, but may last five years instead of 10.

While parents want to create living spaces outside, having a place for kids to play is also important to many.

"The backyard playground industry, is, and always has been, on the rise, and this seems to be a better time than ever to get kids active," said Nicholas Stein, owner of funscapes.ca, a manufacturer of playgrounds that's been around for 30 years, in partnership with Jungle Gyms Canada.

"Parents may not want to walk to the park. They want to be able to look out the window as they're making dinner and watch their kids play," he said.

The new playgrounds are mostly cedar, unlike the older metal equipment, and they have a fun, cottage-like feel, he said.

Families can also choose from a variety of playground sets in different price ranges. For families on a budget, Stein recommends their Dreamscape Jungle Gyms, which allow you to mix and match components and add more sections later on.

"Even if people are cutting down their spending, they're still spending money on their kids. So any money they do have tends to go toward their children's safety and entertainment. What better investment for their family than a play system that their kids can grow up with?"

INTO Electronics makes life easier

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

It's almost like looking at a house or business from the future.

Touch screens and remote control are becoming more and more common everywhere you go these days.

But INTO Electronics has been using them for more than 20 years already.

"Our company was founded in 1991, and we primarily do high-end residential homes," said Rod Wechsler, creator and majority owner of INTO Electronics.

The company, which is about 80 per cent commercial, has gone from just doing consulting to installing systems as well.

"We expanded to have a 24/7 electronic management centre, where we can manage remotely," Wechsler said.

That means INTO can open gates and doors to let people in, and can look in to see what's happening if need be.

But INTO will only do that if permitted by the consumer, of course.

"We're able to look in at cameras, but only if we have the authority to do so," Wechsler said. "If not, we do not.

"Usually, it's in the case if there's an alarm or if it's somewhere like a parking garage."

While INTO has been using touch screens since the start, recent technology allows people to comfortably use their own versions of it to manage their home or business.

"Everything's become pretty easy today with the use of iPads, tablets and iPhones," Wechsler said. "In the last two or three years, you can control anything from a tablet now.

"Most of the things are already set up, and you just have to follow the prompts. It's pretty easy and nowadays people know how to do it."

It gives customers incredible flexibility.

"If you've got an iPad, it becomes your touch screen," Wechsler said. "They can unlock doors from it.

"People like to control their heating or their cooling for their cottage when they're not there."

It's something that allows people to better take care of their place, even while they're away.

"If the alarm goes off, you can flash your lights," Wechsler said. "If you're on vacation and on your way back home, you can bring the heat back up.

"It's more of a convenience than anything."

An advantage for those who keep Shabbat is that they don't have to break it to turn anything on.

"We do things for Shabbos as well with automated alarms, where people don't have to arm or disarm them during Shabbat," Wechsler said. "It's just part of the automated cycle and programming data."

And there's plenty of product support available from INTO Electronics.

"We have a 24/7 help desk, so if any clients need assistance or tech support, we're there," Wechsler said. "They're not forwarded anywhere else."

"All of our programming and client systems can be accessed remotely, so we don't have to send programmers or technicians to all of our job sites," Wechsler said.

"We're also able to program things like key fobs or access cards from here. So if, for example, a business needs a door unlocked while they're away, or it was for an emergency, we're able to unlock certain doors from here."

Being a business involved so heavily in remote work, INTO Electronics prides itself on how good of a job they do at being there for the consumer – no matter what time of day.

"Our main focus is level of service and the way we respond," Wechsler said. "We've always got people available and we have our 24/7 control centre, and that elevates us to a different level of service for our clients."

INTO Electronics, which does work across Canada, including in Montreal, can be found online at www.into-electronics.com or by phone at 1-800-445-9949.

No carpet burn from Dominion Rug

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

When entering someone's living room, people will look up, around – and down.

And a high-quality rug or carpet will make the difference when they turn their necks.

Dominion Rug, which has been in business for more than 70 years, gets that.

"It's the fifth wall, basically," said Ben Baum, who purchased the company in 1996. "It's like having artwork on your floor if you have a nice area rug or broadloom, and it's the base of your room and it lifts your room.

"Carpeting is as important as anything in the room, and it can definitely make or break the whole ambience of your room."

That's why Dominion Rug aims to present the finest rugs available.

"We carry everything in carpeting, but naturally we learn more towards the higher end," Baum said. "We have the largest selection of quality carpeting in the city, bar none."

Baum knows that because he's travelled far to gather his inventory.

"I shop the world for products, so we have the most unique and updated products out there right now," he said.

And he's got a group of people in-store to help customers understand what's right for them.

"One of the neat things about us is that no one in the flooring industry can match the experience of our sales staff," Baum said.

"I have two salespeople who have been here over 50 years, and our least experienced person has been here almost 20 years."

That experience comes shining through on the floor.

"We all have the knowledge and expertise to guide the consumer to the right choice," Baum said. "We tell people what to expect from their purchase and what the proper purchase is for the space they want it in."

And after a carpet or rug has been decided on, Dominion Rug continues to offer service and care.

"We have an after-sales department," Baum said. "We offer free spot cleaning for a year, which is added value, and it's the little things we do that the other stores don't do.

Dominion Rug has a workroom where custom hand-knotted and fabricated rugs are made.

"Not too many stores do that in-house," Baum said. "We're known for it, too, and that's why a lot of designers shop here.

"We do a lot of things with carpet that you couldn't even dream of doing."

That includes working with a lot of new materials, many of which are environmentally friendly.

"There are more and more products that are green, even on the synthetic side," Baum said. "There are also some synthetic yarns available today that are incredibly soft."

Dominion Rug will have more space to create and sell at the end of May, when it moves to a 21,000-square-foot facility with plenty of parking space at 52 Samor Road, just off of Dufferin Street and a stone's throw away from the Yorkdale Shopping Centre.

"We're doubling the size of our space and can offer even more products now," said Baum, who will be sending his experienced staff out into an 8,000-square-foot showroom.

That extra space will allow Dominion Rug to continue to try to improve on everything it does.

"We always try to be better and that's our goal," Baum said. "We want to be the best in service and product."

Yorkdale Village to offer affordability in the city

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

When Marc Eichorn joined his father's business 10 years ago, the 20-year-old was keen to learn the tricks of the trade from David Eichorn, a well-known Toronto real estate broker.

Last year, he brought his expertise and knowledge to a new level by partnering with local developer Mike Siskind, with whom he formed Decade Homes.

"I wanted to expand the services my father offers by providing brand new, quality construction at affordable prices," Marc says.

"The biggest challenge in Toronto is for people to enter the real estate market at a price range that they can afford, and that's where we come in."

When sales launch this month, Yorkdale Village's first phase will consist of 75 townhomes ranging from $250,000 to $450,000. The second phase will follow, for a total of 175 townhomes.

The one- and two-storey homes will offer a variety of configurations, many with rooftop terraces or balconies with modern, spacious interiors. "These townhomes are stylish, functional, high quality and affordable," Marc says.

Marc Eichorn

"That's a rare find in this market, to get quality with affordability in Toronto."

As he watches his son become immersed in real estate development, his father is looking on proudly, Marc says.

"My father is excited and encouraging about this project, because he sees the need and potential for it. The real estate development industry in Toronto is making global headlines right now, and the new home market here is one of the hottest in the world. So we're excited to be a part of that."

App helps home buyers

You don't have to leave your couch to shop for a new home or condo.

The New Home Buyers Network has launched an iPad app that gives you a one-stop shop to explore many different developments available in southern Ontario. Last count, there were just under 500 developments listed in the Toronto area.

As Homebuyers.com is still fairly new, many of the developers have not yet posted their information. The ones that have posted their details give you information such as price, location, sizes, models, floor plans, amenities, finishes, upgrades, promotions, priority registration, contact information and a GPS map.

There is even a tab to make notes, and you can bookmark your favourites for easy access later. You don't have to keep the information to yourself, either. The app allows you to share your finds by e-mail, Facebook and Twitter, or you can send a request for more information. Another helpful feature is the mortgage calculator.

It's brought shopping for a home into the 21st century. Best of all, the app is free at the App Store.

Great prices, huge selection at Royal Lighting

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Walk into Royal Lighting (416-782-1129) and prepare to be dazzled by the huge array of chandeliers, sconces, table lamps and other types of lighting on display at the sprawling showroom at Avenue Road and Lawrence Avenue (1549 Avenue Rd.).

In fact, the biggest challenge for Royal Lighting customers may be deciding on what to buy, because the selection of gorgeous light fixtures and lamps is so impressive.

And you won't blow your budget either, says general manager Michael Gladstone. "We have the best prices."

Gladstone takes great pride in the store's wide selection of lighting options. "At Royal Lighting, we are very committed to and passionate about lighting.

"Our selection and service makes us the ideal showroom in Canada for all of your lighting needs."

Indeed, the showroom offers so many lighting choices from chandeliers, sconces and pot lights to outdoor lighting, ceiling fans and lamps, (www.royallighting.com), that making a selection could be very tough.

If you're looking for a crystal chandelier, Royal Lighting carries traditional styles with tear-drop crystals, described by Gladstone as "timeless."

But the store also has some new takes on the classic styles. For instance, you can find the traditional candelabra style with round or pear-shaped crystals, or one of the showroom's most elegant fixtures – a traditional candelabra with carved crystal leaves.

You may also want to check out the showroom's modern chandelier designs with their creative use of crystal. Firstly, the shapes of the actual crystal vary from design to design. So you can find fixtures made up of strings of small octagonal shaped crystal in rectangular shapes or similar shaped chandeliers made up of rectangular crystals.

Then there is an array of rectangular chandeliers of various sizes made of different shaped crystals hanging in rows that give off a shimmering light.

The chandeliers can be made of chrome, brass and even solid crystal blocks, and they can also have shades made of silk or brass.

Royal Lighting also carries an array of fixtures mounted on rods and round hat-boxed shaped fixtures that evoke an Art Deco feel. For look from an earlier era, there is also a selection of Tiffany lamp-style fixtures.

Chandeliers are no longer relegated to dining rooms and foyers, says Gladstone, noting that they're used in bedrooms, kitchens and even bathrooms. He adds that many of the chandeliers in the showroom have matching flush-mount lights.

He says there are several lighting options for kitchen islands. Pendant lights on wires or mounted to rods are a traditional choice, but many designers are now using chandeliers. He points to a rectangular-shaped chandelier with a four-foot span that he says would work well over an island.

If you're in the market for outdoor lighting, there's a big selection of fixtures, including traditional lantern-style lights, "for a turn of the century-look," says Gladstone.

He advises people to include vanity lights in larger bathrooms to supplement pot lights.

If there are two sinks he suggests two sources of vanity lighting. Wall sconces are another option.

Gladstone says floor lamps and matching table lamps are still popular options for family and living rooms. In bedrooms, swing wall lamps are a frequent choice.

As for ceiling fans, Royal has more than 70 styles, he says.

There's also a huge number of lampshades – in cloth and cotton – to choose from. "We have the biggest selection of lampshades in Canada."

Royal Lighting carries a wide array of desk lamps and offers various lighting options for children. A stand-out choice for that young hockey fan is a light that replicates the Maple Leaf scoreboard and clock at the Air Canada Centre.

You'll also find all kinds of lighting hardware, from coloured switch-plates and dimmers to an assortment of light bulbs.

He also suggests using North-American-made, low-voltage halogen bulbs in pot lighting. "They're 30 per cent brighter and they can last two to five times as long."

As huge as the choice may be at Royal Lighting, there are always new items coming in, Gladstone says. "Things change every year. We get on average about 100 new items a month."

Minto30Roe: life in motion at Yonge & Eglinton

Advertising Feature

With stunning architecture, superb interiors and an outstanding location, Minto30Roe offers everything you could ask for in a new condominium. And if that isn't enough, Minto30Roe will feature a truly phenomenal fitness centre that has yet to be seen in Toronto.

Say goodbye to fluorescent lighting, motivational stock images and out-of-date equipment. Minto's 6,000-square-foot Movement Haus fitness centre will shock and awe, transforming the typical condo gym into a truly unparalleled experience.

To develop the fitness facility at Minto30Roe, Minto partnered with Mark Stables, the driving force behind the Movement Haus concept – an idea that's revolutionizing fitness in condominium living and providing a multi-faceted and all-encompassing facility that's much more than your typical workout.

Minto30Roe will be a true "wellness community," with the opportunity for fitness classes, training and even gourmet nutrition classes in the caterer's kitchen. Classes like these will be offered à la carte, at your convenience. There's no need for a health-club membership when everything you need is right here.

Minto envisioned designihg and allocating such a large portion of amenity space to a fitness centre because they saw that improvements could be made to give their residents a more encompassing and enjoyable experience. "Today's condominium residents are more design savvy and health conscious than ever. They need more than a few pieces of equipment in a room with a mirrored wall," says Stables.

The physical setup of the space marries function and design. "Working in close partnership with Minto and the II BY IV Design team, we focused on activities that we know purchasers are looking for – gravity, spinning, TRX, strength training, yoga and more – the active lifestyle they're wanting and seeking to cultivate," notes Stables.

And for those who need a moment to unwind post workout, beside the fitness area, a "breakout room" with Wi-Fi is a great place to relax.

Though Minto invested on average, three times more on the Minto30Roe fitness centre than other condo developers, the cost to manage and maintain the space is equal, keeping maintenance fees down. "Minto deserves huge kudos for their forward-thinking approach," Stables says. "I've worked as a personal trainer for 15 years in the condominium market and this is truly groundbreaking."

Minto30Roe is a great place to break a sweat and the location is just as fab! # Moving your memories the easier way

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Moving is one of the most stressful things you will ever do. Whether staging your house for sale, relocating a busy family, or downsizing to a condo or retirement community, you'll need to sort through your precious possessions. While you can't wave a magic wand and make the work go away, you can call Red Coats Moving Solutions (www.redcoatsmoving.com, 416-920-1317) and gain an experienced and compassionate ally to make the transition as smooth as possible.

Working in marketing for a retirement residence nearly 10 years ago, Vicky Keyes, whose background is in hospitality, couldn't help noticing how traumatic the move was for clients who "were often overwhelmed at the thought of downsizing… and didn't have somebody to help them."

Downsizing a lifetime of possessions, Keyes says, can be fraught with emotional landmines. And with adult children far away or busy with their own careers, she noticed a need and stepped in to help. "There were companies doing this in the States," but there was nobody locally to call on.

In 2004, Red Coats became the first Canadian company to join the U.S.-based National Association of Senior Move Managers, and Keyes and her crew have been hard at work ever since.

Without help, it's easy to get overwhelmed, particularly when you're moving into a smaller home or retirement community.

Red Coats Moving Solutions moves memories

"We try to work through the whole process with them," Keyes says, beginning with a floor plan of the new location. "If people bring the wrong furniture, or too many things, they'll be surrounded by boxes they can't even unpack. They'll become even more anxious and stressed."

Most importantly, Keyes says, the client's wishes come first. The focus at Red Coats is on empowering clients to make their own decisions and set their own priorities, while at the same time, deciding what to bring or give away.

Clients' wishes come first. In one family, a daughter couldn't understand why her mother was upset at her offer of brand-new furniture. "The mother said to me, 'That's the chair that my husband always sat in when he was alive. That's why I want to bring that chair with me.' We always make sure, even if the children are there to help out, that we really listen to what the client wants."

Each item may have its own emotional connections: "memories of trips they've been on, pictures that might trigger memories of different times in their life. They might have brought their children up in the house, might have had weddings and family celebrations there."

Leave more time than you might expect if you are going to sort through a lifetime of memories. It's more than just tossing things into boxes.

Clients' wishes come first

One client, Keyes says, "showed me a photo of a Lancaster bomber and its crew. He said, 'On this day 60 years ago, I flew my first bombing raid into Germany.' It was important for him to share his experience, his life and his youth, and then move on."

Those memories can be draining, both physically and emotionally, she adds.

Realistically, not everything can come along with you. But that doesn't mean giving up on your passions. "You may not have room for your collection of figurines, wall masks or beer cans, but you can select a few of the best and make an interesting corner with them."

And not every decision is a painful one: some can even be fun, like picking new furniture to save space. And "don't forget what almost every single client I have worked with over the last year has purchased... a new flat screen TV!"

After consulting with clients, Red Coats does its best to take care of the actual move as seamlessly as possible. The day before the move, Red Coats staff arrive to pack items carefully, and they will also deal with the moving company on the day of the move itself. At the new location, Red Coats comes in, unpacks and sets everything up.

"If we've done everything properly," Keyes says, clients "can start living in their new place the very next day. The beds are made, everything is put away, the television is connected, Internet hooked up... They can start enjoying their new life."

Keyes notes that Red Coats is not a moving company. "Anybody can move people – we're about moving people's memories and their lives."

Instead, they work with a number of local moving companies, "small family businesses... They know what our expectations are." All staff are bonded and insured, and most have been with Red Coats for four years or more.

In addition to downsizing, Red Coats is also a certified ReDesign and Staging specialist, offering staging services that will highlight your home's best features and help you sell faster.

"We are professionals from the very beginning to the very end."

2 Neptune's 'residents have become mishpachah'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Monty Mazin, 85, says he counts living at the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community at 2 Neptune Dr. among his life's blessings.

"When Baycrest built the building more than 10 years ago, I was told it would be ideal for me and my wife, Blema. We moved in three weeks after it opened, and it has been a blessing ever since.

"The residents have become mishpachah, and I am proud to be a part of this exciting place. I can't walk down the hall without greeting someone. I'm never lonely."

The building, a 120-unit life-lease building, is designed for active and independent seniors. The life-lease concept allows seniors to maintain a right to occupy their residence. At any time, the resident can sell this right at an appraised market value and keep the proceeds from the sale.

A journalist who worked in public relations, Mazin says that almost immediately upon moving in, the residents formed a council, of which he became vice-president. "One of my accomplishments was starting a shuttle bus service to No Frills at [Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue.]"

He said that he has always emphasized the importance of team effort, "and that has been our strength. We have built on the talents of each person to create a fantastic team. Countless unpaid hours have been put in, and it has certainly 'paid' off."

Mazin, who also handles fundraising and public relations for the building, says that his "greatest satisfaction was raising funds through his participation in the annual Baycrest Boardwalk, a two-kilometre walk by staff, volunteers and family, around Baycrest. "I went door-to-door for six years straight and received a 95 per cent response rate from the appreciative residents."

Monty Mazin

He says he been a life-long volunteer for such organizations as Baycrest, B'nai Brith Canada, Salvation Army and Rotary International. "[Community service] was instilled in me at an early age from my dear Bubba. She was an Orthodox Jew and an activist, and the lesson I learned from her was to 'be a mensch.'"

He's proud, he says, to be an ambassador for the building, "and helping to promote it as the place to live."

He is also proud to be a Baycrest ambassador. "At every opportunity, I talk about the extraordinary work done there by its leadership, staff, and thousands of volunteers who have helped make it a global leader in health and aging."

Salya Rabow, 76, who has lived at 2 Neptune for two years, says she wears "a few hats" in the building, including chair of the program committee.

She helped organize the building's Kozy Korner, a spot for residents to congregate at any time of day. "It's such a simple concept, but so important. They come to sit, read, talk or work on a puzzle which is always on the table."

Salya, who came to Toronto via Montreal, Las Vegas and Florida, said she loves living at 2 Neptune, because she can be as busy and sociable as she likes. "From the beginning, I didn't stop. I got involved right away, and made friends.

"One of the most popular programs is a monthly Sunday picnic held in the social hall. The residents bring food, and we provide coffee. We hold it on Sunday, because it is typically a hard day for people who live alone. This way, they come out and have company."

Real estate in Israel: facts and fiction

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Israel has always been a magnet for Canadian Jews. Some retire and plan on spending a few months here or there in the Holy Land, while for others aliyah is centre-of-mind and the only complexity is working out the details.

Both groups of travellers have something in common: they need accommodation, and the high cost of hotels means an apartment quickly becomes a necessity, whether you're looking to purchase one outright or rent one for a long- or short-term period.

How you do that begins with your budget, says Ilana Nelson, the broker/owner of Integrity Real Estate in Jerusalem. "If you're looking for a shorter-term rental and your budget is around $1,000 per month or less, I recommend looking on local Anglo websites such as craigslist and janglo," she suggests.

Prospective tenants have to be very careful about deals that look too good to be true and rely strongly on their gut instincts when they do so, however. That's because there are many rental scams going on. Fraudsters pose as Israeli homeowners, post images of their so-called homes for rent and accept deposits wired into their bank accounts.

That happened to Marla Gordon, a Vancouver physician, last year while she was hunting for a short-term apartment rental for her family. After extensive e-mails back and forth with the "owner" of the apartment she liked, she paid the deposit by credit card. "But it seemed too good to be true all along," she confessed afterward. More research confirmed she had been scammed on the deposit. Luckily, her credit card company reimbursed her for the money she had paid, but it was a close call.

Ilana Nelson

It happens a lot, says Nelson. "I fell victim to a scam myself a few years ago, and it only became clear that the 'renter' was a fake after weeks of e-mails," she recalls. "I'm happy I didn't lose any money, but I wasted a lot of time with him."

Truth is, there's no real trick to figuring out if the person you are dealing with online is trustworthy or not, she adds. "When it seems too good to be true, it is, so be wary of anything that looks like a bargain," she warns. "Nothing comes cheap in the Holy City."

If your budget is $1,500 per month or more for a rental, it becomes worthwhile to look for an agent, and agents can easily be found on websites or by referral from a friend or acquaintance. But be warned, short-term or vacation rentals vary in price depending on the size, location and extent to which the apartment has been renovated. They could cost up to $5,000 a month.

"I have a gorgeous three-bedroom vacation apartment across from the Inbal hotel that an American bought as an investment," says Nelson. "We rent out the apartment for $3,000 per month and for over $5,000 for holiday periods like Passover and Sukkot."

The difference between paying $2,000 and $5,000 per month often lies in the quality of renovation, or what Nelson refers to as the difference between an "Israeli" renovation and "American quality" renovation. The apartment size and amenities such as parking, Shabbat elevator and sukkah balcony are also factors.

"The most difficult transition for North Americans is the need to adapt to a much smaller living space," she says. That's because a typical three-bedroom apartment in Jerusalem is between 90 and 100 square metres, and most North Americans are not accustomed to living in such a small space.

"I'm working with a family making aliyah in the summer, and they're looking for a four-bedroom apartment in Rechavia for them and their five children," Nelson says. "The general size of a four-bedroom apartment in the area is around 150 square metres, and the minimum cost for a renovated apartment of that size is $1.5 million. For a family moving from a 300-square-metre home, it is shocking to visit a 150-square-metre apartment, especially when that apartment is worth more than the huge home with a pool they are selling in North America. I have to explain to our clients that Jerusalem is comparable to Paris, London and Manhattan in terms of the high cost per square metre."

If your budget is a little more modest than $1.5 million, you may need to steer away from luxury projects and opt for a building where there's neither elevator nor parking. "Here, especially in the more established neighbourhoods, there is only street parking available, which can be a nuisance when coming home with groceries or suitcases," Nelson says. "Older Jerusalem buildings generally do not have elevators. Buyers need to consider whether or not they are prepared to walk up one or two flights of stairs to their apartment."

Real estate tips for Canadians buying or renting in Israel

- Property tax, known as the arnona, is paid either monthly or annually and is set according to the size of the apartment, ranging between 70 to 80 shekels ($18 to $20 Cdn) per square metre. Long-term renters are responsible for paying the tax themselves.
- An additional eight per cent cost is added to the price of a purchased property to cover the lawyer's fee (one to two per cent, plus value added tax – VAT), agent's fee (two per cent plus VAT), and purchase tax (about four to five per cent). Unlike North America where only one side pays commission to the realtor, in Israel the buyer pays two per cent and the owner pays two per cent.
- Looking for a deal? Steer away from high-demand neighbourhoods such as Emek Refaim, Talbieh, the German Colony and Shaarei Chesed. "The farther away the apartment is from the high-demand neighbourhoods, the cheaper rental you will find. However, short-term vacation apartments are harder to come by in peripheral neighbourhoods because there is simply less of a demand," says Nelson.

Menkes introduces Bloom Park Towns

Advertising Feature

The Bathurst and Finch neighbourhood is blooming, now that Menkes' newest community, Bloom Park Towns, is about to be launched for previews this spring.

Located in an established neighbourhood north of Finch, just off Bathurst on Antibes Drive this master-planned community is adjacent to the verdant Antibes Park and G. Ross Lord Park lands system – which also served as inspiration for the community's name. TTC is accessible right on Antibes Drive and directly links to the Finch subway station. An abundance of shopping and conveniences are located along Finch, Steeles and at the nearby Promenade Shopping Centre. There's dining, movie theatres, the North York Civic Centre on Yonge Street and the Prosserman JCC's Sherman Campus, all located close by.

"This is an excellent opportunity for first-time buyers to own a home in a superb established neighbourhood," explains Steven Menkes, president, Low-Rise Residential. "Whereas most townhomes in North York now start well over $400,000, Bloom Park Towns will be attractively priced, beginning from the mid-$300s."

The first homes to be released for sale later this spring will be the Woodland Collection of one- and two-level townhomes ranging from 629 to 820 square feet and the design-forward three-storey Parkside Collection of townhomes ranging from 1305 to 1676 square feet. The townhomes will have special touches that include patios, private rooftop terraces or balconies, to suit different lifestyle needs and budgets.

Bloom Park Towns will feature brick, stone and stucco exteriors set along a harmonious, pedestrian-friendly streetscape. Interiors will boast open-concept living spaces with nine-foot ceilings, European-styled kitchens and premium appliances. The community also offers an outdoor swimming pool, landscaped patio and loggia for summer enjoyment, underground parking and much more.

To preview the Bloom Woodland Collection, visit www.menkes.com to register or call 416-642-8955 for their upcoming preview.

Founded more than 50 years ago, Menkes continues to raise the standard for outstanding design and exceptional value as a fully integrated, multi-disciplinary real estate development company.

Menkes' comprehensive real estate portfolio includes elegant single-family homes, exclusive luxury condominiums and highly coveted office, retail and industrial premises.

On a Saturday morning, the smell of freshly baked cinnamon buns wafts through Caplan's, the premium appliance centre that has occupied a sprawling storefront at 1111 Weston Rd. for some 60 years.

Customers are encouraged to have fresh coffee and a nosh, says company president Robert Caplan. "We're a destination store. We try to make the experience worthwhile." (416-767-1655, www.caplans.ca)

Indeed, there's a professional pastry chef on site preparing the cookies, buns and whatever goodie is on the menu that day.

It's a way for customers to see how the appliances work, Caplan explains. "We'll show them what it's about."

He says the company takes that experience one step further at the Miele Gallery (mielegalleryCaplans.ca), the stand-alone European appliance centre across the street from the main store. "It's an extremely unique retail experience."

The gallery has a full-time chef on hand preparing seasonal foods on the Miele appliances. The cooking demos offer customers a hands-on experience, Caplan says. "We encourage people who buy Miele to come back. We have events happening all the time.

"We want our customers to really love our products and we want them to get the most enjoyment from these appliances and learn with us."

He says the company prides itself on its competitive prices and excellent customer experience. "People coming here are spending big money on appliances. They expect premium service.

"We're all about presenting value at the high end. That takes a dedication to service."

The company often advocates with the manufacturers on behalf of its customers. "We use our leverage to get manufacturers to look after our customers properly. People don't want to be passed off to a 1-800 number."

Caplan's specializes in such premium brands as Sub-Zero, Wolf, Thermador, Viking and Jenn-Air, he says. "We pretty much carry all the major high-end lines. We start at a higher level than most stores. Our entry level starts with a Kitchenaid."

Most of their appliances are manufactured in the United States, but Miele, is produced in Germany. "People will pay more for better-made products."

Caplan points out that there is also an outlet division on the premises. "We offer special buys and we bring exclusive offers to people. We have substantial discounts on new, fully warrantied premium products.

"Items from trade shows are also discounted. The only difference from regular priced items is that the discounted appliances are not coming in a box."

Caplan's was founded by Herb Caplan in the early '40s. Herb's son Martin developed and expanded the business over a 50-year period, says Caplan, the third generation to run the family business. He's been at the helm for the last 10 years

His father, Martin, is now retired, but Fran, his mother, continues to be involved.

Between the sales, warehouse and delivery departments, the company employs about 30 to 40 people.

Caplan praises his sales team, describing them as a knowledgeable and experienced group that does not pressure people into making quick purchases. "Our objective is to educate the customers and help them find the product that's right for them. We don't believe in a pushy sales approach.

"Sometimes a sale can take weeks or months. There's a lot of product. People can make a decision without feeling that they're being rushed."

Caplan's may be 70 years old, but the store is constantly upgrading, Caplan says. We have a lot of intense competition. Unless we're at the top of our game, we're not going to survive.

"Our objective is to be the No. 1 premium appliance destination in Canada."

He notes that the store has updated its image by developing a strong online presence. "We wanted to show that the business is evolving."

Other changes include the newly remodelled outside façade and the two-year-old Miele Gallery – "it's the first of its kind in North America" – which, according to Caplan, has proven to be an innovative retail experience.

He says Caplan's relationship with its customers spans multiple generations. "Many customers come because their parents came here."

And there's a high degree of trust, he adds. "People call us up and say, 'I need a new' washer. Send whatever one you think is best.'

"We have built up a lot of trust with our customers over the years. They feel we have the right products and they know we'll look after them."

Builder's business is his passion

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

John Sopta, owner of the family run Sopta Group, custom homebuilders since 1996, has been swinging a hammer since he was four years old.

"My father, Jozo, who just turned 80, was in construction all his life. He became an apprentice in the former Yugoslavia when he was 14, and I have many memories of working next to him. [The business] is in my blood."

Sopta says he has worked in a number of fields that have prepared him for this business. "I have been a lender in a bank, a project manager for a builder, and I have worked in the trucking industry. Each job moved me closer to where I am today."

The Sopta Group is an A to Z business, he said. "We do everything from zoning amendments or changing building plans, through to design, completion and occupancy. We also have houses on the go that can be purchased."

Currently, the Sopta Group (905-761-3383, www.thesoptagroup.com) has three houses in Kleinburg, a small condominium project in Mississauga, and two homes in Laurelwood, an executive community in Waterloo, Ont.

"We appreciate that your new home is one of your greatest investments, so we are satisfied only when you are satisfied. We strive to make the building experience an enjoyable, creative one for all our clients, and welcome your involvement and suggestions every step of the way."

Part of his company's success, he says, is the longstanding relationships he has with tradespeople, "many of whom we've been working with since 1996. We value and respect their skills and contributions, which results in the highest standards of craftsmanship in all our homes."

His wife, Janice, a partner in the business is the director of décor, he said. "She deals with decorating and design, and is always happy to work within a budget. Anyone who calls can be confident that they'll get what they want, and what they need."

New luxury living: The Perry

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

Luxury living in Toronto is no longer what it used to be. Many people seeking fine living are now looking for a boutique, tailored upscale residential experience, and not the huge, impersonal luxury condominiums that currently line many of the city's streets.

"The level of luxury and of quality living in the city has evolved," said Nargues Mansouri who, along with her sister, Maryam, is vice-president of Mansouri Living, a commercial and residential development company.

The Mansouri sisters saw this change in the luxury living market as an opportunity, and worked hard to put together a unique boutique condominium project called The Perry (www.theperry.com).

The Perry, which is expected to be built in March of next year, will be on the northern edge of Yorkville, and will feature 45 suites ranging from 650 to 3,950 square feet. "People are looking to be in the heart of things, but not in the hustle bustle of Yorkville," said Mansouri, explaining that the building's quieter location, steps away from restaurants and coffee shops, will allow residents to relax, even in the centre of Toronto.

In fact, The Perry will be tailored to giving residents a relaxing experience, no matter what it is they're setting out to do.

The building is equipped with a 24/7 white-glove concierge to help residents with their needs at any hour of the day or night. Additionally, residents will receive a one-year membership to Quintessentially, a private member's club with worldwide round-the-clock concierge services, ready and waiting to accommodate requests both at home and abroad.

"We really did a lot of research trying to get the best of the best," said Mansouri.

The far-reaching concierge services are an extension of the amenities offered by the building itself. The sleek, modern and inviting condominium complex will feature top-of-the-line design as well as furniture and appliances, including pieces from Poliform and Gaggenau, chosen both for their superior quality and sharp esthetics.

"There are these buildings in downtown Toronto that claim to be luxurious, but when you analyze the finishings, they really fall short," said Mansouri. She explained that, in planning The Perry, no luxury was spared, even in the small details.

The tasteful, elegant interior design of The Perry extends from the suites to the communal areas, including the piano lounge, a private dining room with a caterer's kitchen and a serene garden terrace designed to create an outdoor escape in the heart of Toronto.

"We really try to target people who have an appreciation and an affinity for design," said Mansouri said, adding that the entire building was designed with the style-savvy resident in mind.

For Mansouri Living, the importance of style and design is accompanied by an environmental awareness.

The Perry, Mansouri explained, was designed using green materials and building processes. "It's not an afterthought. It was really integrated from step one," she said of the importance of being environmentally friendly.

Mansouri feels that The Perry will naturally attract design-lovers looking to lead a green, luxurious lifestyle in Toronto, but even more than that, she believes its residents will be community-focused.

"They want to live in a community, they want to know their neighbours," she said.

The Perry's boutique size, and its uniform high-end finishings (no matter which size suite you live in) create an intimate, shared setting within the building, a place where Mansouri envisions a thriving mini-neighbourhood.

For her, that is the most unique and exciting part of the new project. "It's all cohesive. It's all one community."

Linens from the best

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

Touch is as important a sense as any when it comes to the home.

And a lot of that comes from things such as bed linens, table linens and towels.

That's why places like Deblins and David's Fine Linens specialize in those items.

From one little shop 35 years ago to two "big-box style" stores, Deblins focuses on mid- to high-end bed, bath and table items, giving consumers plenty of reasons to go there rather than a department store.

"There are a lot of differences," said Deblins' Sari Rajsky. "Our depth and range of product is much wider and much nicer.

"Some (department stores) might show one bedding design, but don't actually have stock of it. We try to keep things in stock in all of the sizes."

They don't pull any punches when it comes to cost, either.

"Our pricing is very different than department stores," Rajsky said. "They usually sell stuff 'on sale,' marked at 30 to 50 per cent off.

"Because of our low markup, that sale price there is actually our full price."

And of course, the staff at Deblins know their goods, which come from more than 25 regular suppliers from places such as Israel, China, Portugal and Turkey.

"If you go into those other places, they don't actually have service people working in the area," Rajsky said. "You may not be able to find people to help or who can answer questions about the product and how to care for it.

"Our salespeople know bedding and towels," Rajsky said of the staff, some of whom have been working at Deblins for more than 25 years. "That's what people love about coming to the store."

For the bathroom, the same knowledge comes in handy when discussing towels or matching collections.

"We have between 75 and 80 different bath accessories collections," Rajsky said. "We have so many different collections."

Deblins began in the table-linen business and remains in it, although some of its focus has changed.

"We still cater to those looking for very high-end table linens, lace and high-end fabrics that we custom order," said Rajsky of her company that still stocks tablecloths over 212 inches long.

"But as consumer taste has moved towards easier care, we've also moved that way, and now have a very wide range of easier-care fabrics and younger-looking ones, too."

If only the most exceptional items will do, then David's Fine Linens is right up your alley.

"This is the best stuff that you can get," said David Saini. "There is no higher end than what we sell."

That includes such names as Hugo Boss, Emanuel Ungaro and, coming in the fall, Roberto Cavalli. And David's Fine Linens will be the only place in the country carrying the high-demand product.

"We've got a lot of exclusive products to Canada at David's Fine Linens," Saini said. "The best linens in Europe are the ones we get, and we only bring in the best brands."

If you want to sleep like a star, this is where to go.

"The products we carry are the ones that celebrities use," said Saini, who says the same for their silk duvets, down duvets and towels that are considered the finest in the world.

"We are not about price. We are about quality."

Naturally, a knowledgeable sales staff is required when selling such exclusive products.

"We have top-notch service, and you have to go in the store to experience it," said Saini.

"We have a lot of highly qualified people with experience designing bedrooms and can put everything together."

David's Fine Linens can be found online at www.davidsfinelinens.com or reached by phone at 416-590-7311. Locations include the Bayview Village Shopping Centre and a new store at Highway 7 and Weston Road.

Deblins, which has locations on Orfus Road (near the Yorkdale Shopping Centre) and in Vaughan, Ont., can be reached at 416-782-2910 or on the web at www.deblins.com, where you can also make online purchases.

Israelis protest social conditions

Ilan Lior
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Social justice rallies were held across Israel this past Saturday night, with the largest taking place in Tel Aviv, where thousands of people gathered in Rabin Square.

The protest marches in Tel Aviv began in the Shapira, Levinsky, and Hatikva neighbourhoods before joining together and continuing on to Rabin Square. Demonstrators chanted, "We want justice, not charity" and "Taking from the poor, giving to the rich, what a country of corruption."

"The message is one against the political system that does not count the citizens," Orli Barlev, a rally organizer, said. "What we saw this week [the unity government deal] were moves that resulted from personal interests of power and control.

"This government has greatly deepened social gaps," she added.

Rallies were to be held in cities throughout Israel, including Jerusalem, Haifa, Kiryat Shmonah, Nahariya, Pardes Hanna and Eilat, under the banner of "Returning the country to the citizens."

Similar rallies were held throughout the world on Saturday for "Global May," an international day of protest marking the anniversary of the protest in Puerta del Sol, Madrid, where a massive people's assembly took control of the famous square in 2011.

Students Visit Israel

SASKATOOON — Sixteen students from the University of Saskatchewan's Edwards School of Business visited potash mines in Israel and Jordan and learned about overseas entrepreneurship on an 11-day tour earlier this month. They went as part of a new international course that traces Saskatchewan exports. It will run every May and will visit different destinations, such as Chile and India, business dean Daphne Taras told News Talk 980 in Saskatoon. The trip was subsidized by PotashCorp, the university and the province.

Vidal Sassoon Dies

LOS ANGELES — Celebrity hairstylist Vidal Sassoon, who battled antisemitism and fought in Israel's War of Independence, died May 9 at home in Los Angeles at age 84. He had been fighting leukemia. In 1982, he established the Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Antisemitism at Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Sassoon, a London native, grew up in a Jewish orphanage from the age of three after his father left the family. He left school at 14 to become an apprentice hairdresser. In 1948, at 20, he joined the Haganah and fought in Israel's War of Independence. He opened his first salon in London in 1954 and later more in England and the United States. In 1973, he created a line of shampoos and styling products, appearing in TV commercials using the slogan, "If you don't look good, we don't look good."

Gay Stand Praised

WASHINGTON — A number of Jewish groups praised U.S. President Barack Obama's endorsement of gay marriage, and an Orthodox group expressed disappointment. "History will regard his affirmation of this core right for the LGBT community as a key moment in the advance of civil rights in America," the Reform movement's Religious Action Center said May 9. Also praising Obama's endorsement, made May 4 in an interview with ABC, were the National Council of Jewish Women, Hadassah, the National Jewish Democratic Council (NDIC) and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism. The Orthodox Union, however, said it was "disappointed." However, the OU statement also "appreciated" Obama's support for laws that protect institutions that dissent from same-sex marriage. Obama did not accompany his endorsement with any legislative initiative, and he has said the matter should be left up to states. Agudath Israel of America, another Orthodox umbrella body, didn't directly address Obama's statement. But it blasted the NDIC for saying the statement advanced "tikkun olam," the imperative to repair the world.

Children's Author Wrote Iconic Book

Maurice Sendak

NEW YORK — Maurice Sendak, author and illustrator of the children's book Where the Wild Things Are, died May 8 in Danbury, Conn., at age 83.

Sendak, who wrote and illustrated more than 50 children's books, reportedly suffered a stroke May 4.

Sendak, the son of immigrant Polish Jews, grew up in Brooklyn and said he spent his childhood thinking about the children dying in the Holocaust. "My burden is living for those who didn't," he told Associated Press.

Sendak, who did not attend university, became a window dresser for Manhattan toy store FAO Schwarz in 1948. A self-taught illustrator, he was commissioned to illustrate the book Wonderful Farm by Marcel Ayme in 1951 and, in 1957, began writing his own books.

In 1964, the American Library Association awarded Sendak its Caldecott Medal for Where the Wild Things Are. He received the international Hans Christian Andersen medal for illustration in 1970, and in 1983, he won the Laura Ingalls Wilder Award from the American Library Association. In 1996, he won a National Medal of the Arts in for his body of work.

Israeli president calls for caution on Iran

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel should proceed with caution in its increasingly tense confrontation with Iran, Israeli President Shimon Peres said last week.

Iran is a regional "menace" and its nuclear program poses a "real danger" to the Jewish state, but Israel should exhaust all possible options before resorting to military force, said Peres, a former prime minister and defence minister.

"It's better to start with non-military efforts than to go straight to war," he said, striking a moderate tone and describing his position as "a reasonable policy."

Speaking to a near capacity audience at a community event sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and held at the Sony Centre for the Performing Arts, Peres hewed to the high road.

While agreeing that "all options" should remain on the table," Peres said that economic sanctions and political pressure should be allowed to work before Israel considers a strike on Iran's nuclear facilities.

Visiting Toronto in the course of a state visit to Canada, Peres said the campaign to stop Iran from acquiring a nuclear arsenal should be spearheaded by the United States and countries such as Canada.

Rather than exclusively being an Israeli source of concern, he added, Iran's atomic ambitions are really a world problem.

Madrassah apology said unsatisfactory

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) has rejected an apology from a Muslim organization for distributing a school curriculum that reviled Jews.

"They apologized," said SWC spokesperson Avi Benlolo. "We rejected the apology based on the fact that we do not believe that removing the curriculum and getting a new group of scholars [to re-examine it] is sufficient. The onus is on them to convince the Jewish community, Ontarians and Canadians that they're sincere."

The FSWC and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) are concerned about a curriculum of the East End Madrassah that called Jews "treacherous," "crafty," accused them of conspiring to kill the prophet Muhammad, and in a section on jihad, compared the beliefs of the Jews with those of Nazis.

York Regional Police's hate crimes unit is investigating the curriculum as possibly promoting hatred of Jews. The FSWC had asked police to look into the material.

The curriculum was removed last week from the website of the East End Madrassah. The madrassah rents space for its classes at the David and Mary Thomson Collegiate Institute, a public high school in the Lawrence Avenue and Brimley Road area. The madrassah is run by the Islamic Shia Ithna-Asheri Jamaat (ISIJ), located in Thornhill.

Although the East End Madrassah pulled the curriculum from the web, it was, however, still available elsewhere online. The curriculum acknowledges that, "This textbook is based on the Islamic Law & Ethics series by Sayyid Muhammad Rizvi and material from www.madressa.net."

A report in the National Post linked passages in the curriculum to books published by two Iranian foundations, the Al Balagh Foundation and the Mostazafan Foundation of New York. The United States alleges the latter was a front organization for the Iranian government.

"As Canadians, we are deeply troubled at the notion that children in our country are learning from materials published by an organization that, according to the FBI, is directly controlled by the ayatollahs of Iran," said CIJA chair David Koschitzky.

Responding to concerns about the curriculum's content, the ISIJ ran a "communiqué" on the front page of its website (jaffari.org), signed by Imam Rizvi. It states that the ISIJ has long been involved in interfaith dialogue and has won a Harmony Award with its neighbour, Temple Har Zion, for promoting Canadian values.

The document also states: "While the revelation of the existence of inappropriate language used in the material on the East End Madrasah (EEM) website is hurtful to the Jewish community, and an unreserved apology has been offered to them, it was also hurtful to us, because we sense that this may have disappointed our fellow citizens who have known us and what we stand for. The EEM has acknowledged a failure within its internal system that has enabled unauthorized content to be included in the textbook without appropriate review. We are committed to improve the system to ensure that such mistakes are not repeated.

"As of this moment, we have reached out to the representatives of Jewish organizations and others to work with our community partners to foster better understanding and relationship between the faith groups... We are also internally reviewing our policies, procedures, and the curriculum to understand what went wrong, and how to avoid similar incidents in the future."

Benlolo, however, said, "It appears to me that over the years, they've talked about interfaith relationships, but clearly from the course, they're involved in teaching material that is hateful and antisemitic. We've made that known to them. You can't teach hatred against another group. You can't call Jews treacherous, conniving or [like] Nazis. It's wrong."

CIJA spokesperson David Spiro said he is concerned there is no way to know how long the material was on the web, how many people saw it and whether similar material is being taught in other schools. "We want to make sure it does not go on, that these kinds of lesson plans full of hatred and vilification of Jews should not be used on TDSB premises," said Spiro.

The school board issued a news release stating that it "does not support or tolerate any group that promotes hatred.

"We will continue to work with police on their investigation and will take appropriate action pending the conclusion of the investigation."

The release also noted that the permission given to third parties to use TDSB facilities includes a provision against breaking the law or promoting hatred, breach of which could lead to cancellation of the permit.

Benlolo said "we've been in contact" with the East End Madrassah, and, "it's not friendly."

Ontario, Israel urged to boost brain research

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Israeli President Shimon Peres says Ontario and Israel should increase their research co-operation in developing new treatments for neurological disorders such as Alzheimer's and Parkinson's.

Peres spoke at a roundtable sponsored by Baycrest in partnership with the Ontario Brain Institute and the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation during his state visit to Canada last week.

Addressing the panel, Peres said that "we live in a new age with an old mind. There is a disharmony between how we live and what we have to face."

In modern human development, he said, land has suddenly stopped being humanity's major provider. "It has been replaced by science, and science is totally different. The army can't control science, and science doesn't have borders.

"The brain is the most brilliant instrument we possess. It guides us, but we don't have any idea how it functions. We know what is happening around us, but we don't know what is happening inside us. We have to try to understand this mechanism. [It contains] one of the greatest secrets of our lifetime."

Also participating in the roundtable were experts in various areas of brain research and the commercialization of applications related to it.

They included University of Toronto president David Naylor; Peter Carlen, senior scientist at the Toronto Western Research Institute; Rafi Gidron, founder and chair of Israel Brain Technologies; Randy McIntosh, director of Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute, and John Soloninka, president and CEO of HTX – the Health Technology Exchange.

Each spoke briefly about their respective areas of research or expertise, and each praised the potential scientific, medical and other benefits to Canada and Israel of increasing such high-level collaboration between the two countries.

In introducing the roundtable, William Reichman, president and CEO of Baycrest, said that two years ago, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty led a trade mission to Israel and the West Bank to promote Ontario's innovative life sciences companies, as well as to attract investment and strengthen cultural ties.

It was during that mission, Reichman said, that participants realized the world was on the threshold of a new age.

"Whoever we are, we are enabled by a healthy mind, and a healthy mind is supported by a healthy brain. We must find the next generation of therapies."

He said that if the onset of Alzheimer's disease can be delayed by five years, the prevalence of the disease could be lowered by 50 per cent.

"If it can be delayed by 10 years, it could be eradicated," Reichman said.

"We must do for brain [research] in coming years, what we have done for heart research."

Panel facilitator Henri Rothschild, president of the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), said that brain research spans a range of disciplines, from research to application.

The panel, he said, represents a road map of what Canadians are capable of doing as partners with Israel.

Soloninka, the self-described "business guy" on the panel, said that globally, Ontario stands fourth in neuroscience research. "Israel and Ontario [share a vision] and have the ability to contribute to each other. The Brain Institute embodies that collaboration."

'The test of this government is if it works for peace'

Peres, 88, delivered his comments against the backdrop of media speculation that Israel may be preparing to launch a preemptive attack on Iran.

Looking somewhat physically frail but completely mentally alert, he was formally introduced by Canadian filmmaker Robert Lantos, who called him "the personification of the Zionist dream and Israel's ambassador to the world."

Taking questions on a bare stage from conservative Canadian journalist David Frum, Peres was asked his opinion of Israel's new coalition government, headed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and bolstered by the addition of the centrist Kadima party, headed by Shaul Mofaz.

"The test of this government is if it works for peace," he said in a reference to the stalled peace process with the Palestinians.

But Israel's government will also be judged by its stance on Iran, he noted.

Peres, who recently praised Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as "a worthy and serious partner [who] can deliver the goods," expressed hope regarding the prospects for peace.

Noting that the PA has embarked on a program to build up its economy and a network of institutions in the West Bank, Peres advised Israel "to conclude this process" with a formal peace agreement.

Warning that a peace accord will exact a price from both sides, and may even be imperfect, he observed, "To make peace, you have to make concessions."

Commenting that compromise is the essence of negotiations, Peres likened peace to romantic love: "You can't achieve [it] unless you close your eyes a bit."

Peres, claiming that the gap between Israel and the Palestinians has narrowed by a considerable degree, declared that an agreement should be based on a two-state solution in which Israel and a future Palestinian state coexist in peace and mutual understanding.

"There is an Israeli consensus that peace should be based on two states."

If Israel managed to forge a peace agreement with Jordan, there is no reason why Israel cannot live in peace with a Palestinian state, he said.

Asked whether Israeli settlements in the West Bank are provocative, Peres, once a champion of settlements, deflected the question, saying he saw no sense in "criticizing the past."

Implicitly defending the expansion of existing settlements to accommodate population increases, he suggested that Israel's retention of settlement blocs should be enshrined in a peace agreement.

In reply to questions about current developments in the Arab world, Peres said he expects Israel's peace agreement with Egypt to hold and the Baathist regime in Syria to fall.

He also claimed that the problems besetting Arab governments today turn on economics rather than politics.

Peres acknowledged that Israeli Arabs – a minority comprising 20 per cent of Israel's population – suffer from economic discrimination because the high-tech revolution that has changed Israel has virtually passed them by. But Israel is trying to remedy this problem, he said.

Turning to Israel's bilateral relations with foreign countries, Peres described its relationship with the United States as "very warm." As he put it, "Israel enjoys friendship and admiration in the United States." Still, he admitted, disagreements emerge from time to time.

In a brief survey of Israeli diplomacy, Peres said Israel has good relations with China, India, the Vatican, Canada and the nations of Europe.

He then thanked the Jewish community in Toronto for being so loyal to Israel.

Recalling Israel's birth in 1948, he mused that Israel hardly stood a chance against the combined might of seven attacking Arab armies. "We were outmanned and outgunned," said Peres, who played a key role in procuring weapons for Israel at the time.

In philosophical and humorous reflections about Israel's early days and the hardships Jewish pioneers endured in settling an inhospitable land short of water, Peres quipped, "We have two lakes. One is dead, the other is dying."

Warming to his topic, he said, "We had nothing, and that made us a great people. The people enriched the land."

Peering into the future, he said, "Israel will live more and more on science. We will succeed on the basis of science, daring and a will to improve. We are the people of Facebook."

In conclusion, Peres maintained that "the force of ideas is greater than the strength of armies," and said that Israel's quest for perfection is well worth pursuing, even if it falls short of the mark.

Outside the Sony Centre, with police looking on nervously, pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian groups held aloft Israeli and Palestinian flags and waved placards inscribed with such slogans as "Support Israel" and "Stop Israeli apartheid."

With the Palestinians and their supporters chanting "Free, free Palestine" and "Viva, viva Palestina," a man on the opposite side of the road roared into a megaphone, "Israel has wanted peace from day one! Israel strives for peace!"

A historic visit

By any and every measure, the recently concluded state visit to Canada by Israeli President Shimon Peres must be hailed as a pointedly moving and even far-reaching success. As our staff writer in Montreal noted about Peres' visit there, "Israel's ninth president was received as a revered and iconic historical figure."

This observation was true of the Jewish community members with whom the 88-year-old president met in his three-city tour and also of the broader community – politicians, scientists, professionals, academics, entrepreneurs, industrialists and businessmen – with whom he met.

Indeed, Peres' visit may very well have redefined the notion of bilateral relations between the two sovereign states. To be sure, the conventional markers of Canada's diplomatic and intergovernmental relations with Israel were heartily and demonstrably confirmed to be strong and sturdy.

But so great a proportion of the president's visit was spent with men and women steeped in biological sciences, high-tech industries and all manner of knowledge-based spheres of endeavour that the seeds were planted of a new paradigm of bilateral relations comprising a vast life-improving, society-enhancing network between Canada and Israel of myriad, interconnected, science-based filaments of contacts, joint ventures, cooperative explorations and partnered programs.

One of the guests who attended the state dinner in Peres' honour was so impressed by the non-political, non-conventional nature of the focus of the many public meetings in which the Israeli president took part that he told The CJN "the Peres visit represented a turning point in Canada-Israel relations."

The president's participation at the very outset of his visit in the signing of an agreement between the Royal Society of Canada and the Israel Academy of Sciences was a clear indication that this visit would be different than state visits of the past. The emphasis that Peres personally brought to his Canadian hosts was a singular stress on matters of the mind, not of material, on harnessing the vast potential of the human being's yearning to seek and discover rather than on the human being's yearning to acquire and possess.

Peres and Gov. Gen. David Johnston painted a new, grand design for bilateral ties between Canada and Israel that reimagines strategic relations resting upon much sounder footing than "mere" pillars of defence and security.

Their design includes far longer-lasting and more profoundly substantive pillars such as bilateral trade in knowledge, partnered technological development, collaborative scientific innovation, binational institutions of joint research and all that yet remains to be discovered and applied in the inexhaustible realm of human need, curiosity, science and knowledge that will lead to mutual economic benefit and, far more importantly, to untold humanitarian benefit for all mankind.

Tribute to Israel

Reborn out of the ashes of the worst period in human history, Israel has blossomed into a country that should truly be and in many ways is the envy of the world. While it has produced one of the world's most robust and dynamic economies, a flourishing civilian army and has exported life-saving medical technologies around the globe, we must never forget Israel's role as a safe haven for global Jewry. Reports indicate that violence against European Jewry has increased, and Canada witnessed 68 hate crimes against Jews in 2011. If history is any guide, there's no indication that such acts will decline in the future. With the recent Jewish day-school shooting in Toulouse, France, and the rash of antisemitic incidents that plagued Brooklyn, N.Y., last November, we are constantly reminded as to how much we need Israel.

Although the rest of the world routinely subjects Israel to the gravest of double standards in the court of world opinion, and kindergartners in Sderot and Ashkelon routinely spend their afternoon recesses in bomb shelters, Israel continues to flourish as the world's only Jewish state, while justly and vehemently defending itself, even though the odds are and have been stacked against it.

We thank you Israel for all you have done for us these past 64 years. You have been there for us and we will always be there for you. There will never be a time when you will be taken for granted, forgotten or neglected by the Jewish People. We need you at 64 more than ever and will continue to celebrate the days of your rebirth for eternity.

Turkey cast Jewish refugees adrift

Although Israel was cleared by the United Nations of any wrongdoing in the 2010 flotilla incident involving the Mavi Marmara, Turkey continues to press for a formal Israeli apology and financial compensation for the deaths of nine Turkish activists, using its veto power to bar Israel from next week's NATO summit in Chicago ("Turkey nixes Israeli involvement in NATO summit," April 26).

Turkey need not hold its breath. We are still waiting for an official Turkish apology and restitution for its shameful role in the tragedy of the S.S. Struma 70 years ago. Packed with Romanian and Bulgarian Jewish refugees fleeing the Holocaust during World War II, the ill-fated Struma limped into Istanbul harbour in December of 1941. Instead of offering those poor souls refuge or allowing them overland passage to safety in British-controlled Palestine, the supposedly neutral Turks towed the hapless and inoperative Struma and its human cargo into the Black Sea and cast it adrift. All of its 769 passengers, save for one sole survivor, perished on Feb. 24, 1942, when the Struma was torpedoed and sunk by a Russian submarine. Perhaps Turkey ought first to finally apologize and offer redress for the S.S. Struma before continuing to make similar demands of Israel for the Mavi Marmara!

Pollard is dying

Over 27 years have passed since Jonathan Pollard was sentenced to life imprisonment for spying for Israel. He is the only person in American history to receive a similar sentence for passing classified information to an ally. Such a harsh sentence is in large part due to then-U.S. secretary of defence Caspar Weinberger's well-known personal antipathy to Jews and the State of Israel. Since then, Pollard has spent almost half of his life in prison. His health has deteriorated tremendously. In the meantime, important U.S. officials and members of the security establishment have called for his release, including former CIA director James Woolsey, former secretary of state George Schultz, former deputy defence secretary Lawrence Korb and Senate select intelligence committee chairman Dennis Deconcini. I ask, where is Canadian Jewry? Where are our leaders? Why have they not added their voices publicly to the call for Pollard's immediate release? Pollard is dying. When will Canadian Jewry join with Jews worldwide in saying: "Enough is Enough! Justice for Jonathan Pollard"?

Israeli President Shimon Peres was in Canada from May 6 to 10, during which he met with many politicians and dignitaries, and addressed the Jewish communities of Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto.

After his state visit ended, it was revealed that midway through, Peres, 88, had developed a hernia that, according to CJN sources, kept him in constant pain for the duration of his tour.

Despite this, he refused to cancel any of his scheduled meetings.

He was slated to meet Quebec Premier Jean Charest last Thursday prior to his return to Israel – where he underwent successful surgery on his hernia shortly after his arrival – but the premier cancelled due to a scheduling conflict.

In praise of civil servants

In this age of cutting jobs in the public civil service, both provincially and federally, I thought it was time to look at the reasons why we have civil servants, and what, if anything, our tradition offers to the discussion.

Full disclosure: for more than 20 years I was a Jewish civil servant, at Hillel, then Canadian Jewish Congress' Pacific region (alas, no longer in existence, a development worthy of an article all on its own), then with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver. I dabbled in the public sphere, working for the Vancouver Health Board in one of its iterations, as well as other non-profits.

Let's look at what the bureaucracy does for us as citizens.

Start with the minister – any minister. They get placed in a portfolio about which they may know nothing – who can't think of a multitude of examples? Usually, a portfolio is awarded not for the expertise of the person receiving it, but for the political reward (or punishment) it represents. Far down the rung are things such as multiculturalism and status of women, or family and child services (in a provincial career-killing portfolio) and of course aboriginal affairs.

The high-status stuff? Foreign affairs, treasury or defence, except for those planes and submarines, which have large albatrosses painted on their sides.

Who, then, is in charge of the store, making sure that the ministry runs smoothly, on a time track and within budget, delivering the services we expect in return for our taxes? Who labours to preserve the environment, look after children and families in crisis, make sure that our roads, parks, and other amenities are properly shepherded? Civil servants, who know the ministry and can make sure things get done.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

When less gets allocated, less gets done. With less, you can only do less.

I look at the current call for slimming, or in some cases, gutting the federal civil service, and I note that most of it currently focuses on things like the environment, services benefiting more vulnerable populations, and "frills" such as national archives and parks. After all, who cares about the nation's history or Canada's green and pleasant land when there's oil to be routed, mines to be dug, rivers to dam, planes to fly?

And for a government that says, "We don't govern by statistics," I guess there's little need for Statistics Canada.

But I'm here to write about Jewish Canadian issues. Well, the environment, water, trees, animals, people with needs, our history, and information about these things are a concern for us as Jewish citizens of Canada.

As a community civil servant, I was mentored by people who cared deeply about the Jewish community. They also cared deeply about the welfare of the general community and the health of the state. They saw that we have an obligation that goes beyond our own interests and extends outward to the people, air and water all around us. If one part of that whole becomes stunted or ill, it infects the entire body of the greater community.

As Jewish bureaucrats, we were fortunate to have many volunteers to work with. Government services don't have that luxury. It's up to the civil servant to do her master's bidding, but it's the responsibility of the worker to make sure the minister (or deputy, more often) has the tools to make good decisions. And it's the responsibility of elected officials to know how to use the continuing expertise of the bureaucrats wisely, so that the citizens benefit from the workings of government.

So let's not dump on the bureaucrats, or toss them out like last year's phone book. Without them, we'd be sunk in short order.

"Rabban Gamliel, son of Rabbi Judah Hanasi taught: ... All who work for the community should do so for the sake of heaven, for their ancestral merit will support them, and their righteousness endures forever." (Pirkei Avot 2:2)

The rabbi meant, of course, the Jewish community. But let's not forget that Judah Hanasi worked very closely with the Romans, to the benefit of his people.

And should we want to extend it to today's very ramified community structures, give the civil servants their due. Without them, we would be a poorer, less well-served, nation, ignorant of our past and our present. Believe me, civil servants earn their salaries and more.

Challah links us to personal and national memories

Why does the smell of a challah baking bring such wonderful memories?

As I walked in to my local bakery the other day, I was overwhelmed with thoughts of home and grandparents. I remember both my grandmother's kitchen and my Bubby's. Each was different. Each was filled with wonderful years of family, joy, laughter and definitely good food. Why is it that the aroma itself can immediately stimulate such intense feelings and nostalgia? Sometimes it seems that our heritage is wrapped up in that distinctive fragrance and taste, one that has so many variations, yet so many identical formulations. I hope my grandkids will have similar neural pathways – from nose to memory's heartland.

(If you want to sell your house quickly, bake a challah for the open house. Let the aroma filter throughout. It works like a charm, or so a real estate agent once told my mother-in-law.)

The braided-challah tradition has for generations earned our esteem for its symbolic presence on our tables, and for its absolute sumptuousness. But it was not always so. The rich braided egg bread so easily identified as challah is actually a German/Austrian (Teutonic) invention – not Jewish at all. It was called holle and Jews picked it up in the 15th century. Gil Marks writes all about it in his very erudite and fascinating Encyclopedia of Jewish Food.

Isn't it amazing to learn that what we think of as uniquely ours, as indigenous to our tradition, is in fact borrowed? So many people know this bread as Jewish bread. We have made it so. Not only is it untrue historically, but there are many Jewish communities that have used different bread forms for their Sabbath and festival challot. Some used different words for different kinds of breads, like berches, dabo and chapatis. Some Middle Eastern communities use large pita breads for this tradition. Today, even among some with other customs, the braided egg challah is spreading. It's truly a scrumptious custom.

There is dispute as to the actual meaning of the word challah. It might mean portion, or thick, or pierced. It also refers to the portion of dough that's burned in memory of the tithed bread given to the priests, the kohanim. Challah in the Bible referred to the 12 loaves in the Temple. There are some beautiful prayers said at the time of challah baking, tchines, private petitional prayers that women said as they put their challot into the oven.

The tradition of eating challah emanates from a biblical story told of the Jews wandering in the wilderness for 40 years. During that time, they ate manna from heaven. They were commanded to rest on the Sabbath – no work, not even that of collecting their food, was to be done on Shabbat. The solution: a double portion of manna was "delivered" on Friday. In acknowledgment of this act, Jews put two breads on their Sabbath and festival tables to start their meals. The Sabbath loaves are covered, just like the manna was covered by the dew for protection.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Thus the symbolic meaning of the challah links the individual diner to history and to a national tradition of biblical proportions. It brings forward the glory days of a nation at its elemental beginning, finding its liberation from slavery, its moment of revelation at Sinai and then its slow growth in a long march to full nationhood. By linking challah to manna, certain vital themes are refreshed and established anew for each individual. All this through a lovely piece of bread.

Eventually, these loaves of bread come to dominate notions of festive meals and shared family times. The smell of the bread baking reminds people of all sorts of lovely times with siblings, cousins, parents and grandparents. The smell alone evokes the sense of belonging and longing. That is the essence of nostalgia.

It behooves us to learn about our rich and varied culinary customs. In recipes, we can see a heritage played out between symbolic food items and incorporated foreign items. The foods and associated customs indicate our historic intermingling among the nations. We have managed to keep our kashrut forms while learning the designs and tastes of others. We expanded and diversified and somehow made them uniquely our own. There is a wonderful story hidden in each of our culinary cultures.

Israel wary of second round of nuclear talks

in Toronto

The widely anticipated second round of talks on Iran's controversial nuclear program, set to take place in Baghdad on May 23, will be watched by Israel with a mixture of skepticism and wariness.

Israel, having threatened to launch a pre-emptive attack on Iranian nuclear sites in the face of international opposition, is profoundly concerned that the negotiations will not yield satisfactory results and let Iran off the hook.

Israel's objectives are clear: Iran must transfer its stock of 20 per cent enriched uranium to a third-party nation and ship most its low-enriched uranium out of the country. To Israel, enrichment is the key issue: uranium refined to 20 per cent purity is only a few steps away from bomb-grade uranium.

Iran's ambition to become a member of the exclusive nuclear club, to which Israel belongs, might never have been a burning issue had Iran been willing to coexist with the Jewish state. But since Iran's leaders do not accept Israel's existence, have repeatedly called for its destruction and engage in Holocaust denial to boot, Israel is understandably worried by the spectre of an Iranian atomic bomb.

Iran claims that its nuclear program is peaceful in nature, designed to generate electricity and produce medical isotopes. To Israel, this claim is preposterous. The six world powers – the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany – that will engage Iran next week in Iraq are, to say the least, skeptical about its intentions.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) is wary, too.

Last November, the IAEA released an ominous report expressing "serious concerns regarding the possible military dimensions" of Iran's nuclear program and noting that Iran "has carried out activities relevant to the development of a nuclear explosive device."

Meanwhile, the director of the U.S. National Intelligence office, James Clapper, has warned that Iran's advances in uranium enrichment "strengthens our assessment that Iran has the scientific, technical and industrial capacity to eventually produce nuclear weapons."

The big unanswered question, he added, is whether Iran has the political will to manufacture such weapons.

Both sides, Iran and the six powers, were satisfied with the first round of talks, held in Istanbul on April 14 and hosted by Turkey.

But Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who has likened Iran to Nazi Germany, disagreed with the upbeat assessment, saying Iran had been given a "freebie," or yet more time to enrich its stockpile of uranium.

Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak, has sounded a similar theme. Having asserted that the six-power talks "do not fill me with confidence," he has dismissed the likelihood that Iran will succumb to diplomatic pressure and end its suspected militarized nuclear program.

"We're not playing games here," Barak declared, suggesting that Israel's threat to destroy Iran's nuclear facilities by military means is not merely rhetorical. "Israel cannot afford to be duped."

Netanyahu, rightly or wrongly, is concerned that the six powers may suspend or ease sanctions against Iran in exchange for an Iranian promise to partially freeze uranium enrichment.

In an attempt to soothe Israel's fears, Catherine Ashton, the foreign minister of the European Union and the co-ordinator of the talks, visited Israel last week and told Netanyahu about the Istanbul talks and preparations for the second round.

Ashton's visit was arranged by Netanyahu's national security adviser, Yaakov Amidror, who conferred recently with her deputy, Helga Schmid, in Brussels.

With the talks in Baghdad just a week away, both sides appear fairly optimistic that a breakthrough is possible.

In Tehran, Iranian Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Salehi voiced optimism that the impasse can be settled. As he put it late in April, "If one step ahead was taken in Istanbul, we will certainly take several steps ahead in Baghdad."

In Vienna, the headquarters of the IAEA, the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council – the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France – expressed hope that "a sustained process of serious dialogue" can be launched and that the Baghdad talks can lead to "concrete steps toward a comprehensive negotiated solution which restores international confidence in the exclusively peaceful nature of the Iranian nuclear program."

Given Iran's spotty track record in previous negotiations, skeptics have yet to be convinced that the Iranian leadership is sincerely interested in resolving this problem. Indeed, critics argue that Iran has used talks only to buy time and improve its technical capabilities.

Nonetheless, as U.S. President Barack Obama has observed, "there is still time to pursue a diplomatic solution."

According to a recent report in the Times of Israel website, the vast majority of Israel's political, military and intelligence leadership believes that Israel should not act hastily and give sanctions and diplomacy a chance to work.

American officials who dread the prospect of U.S. involvement in a war between Israel and Iran share this belief, saying that biting sanctions, the assassination of Iranian nuclear scientists and cyber warfare have induced Iran to adopt a more conciliatory approach.

Iran's sanguine portrayal of the Istanbul talks and its positive spin of the forthcoming negotiations in Baghdad may be significant. Iran, perhaps, is preparing Iranian public opinion for a historic deal on the nuclear file.

True or not, the Iranian issue has unleashed deep-seated passions in Israel.

Meir Dagan, the former director of the Mossad, has warned that an Israeli attack on Iran, even if successful, would be stupid and reckless, touching off a devastating regional war. Yuval Diskin, the former head of Shin Bet, has accused the government of misleading the public" about the effectiveness of an Israeli strike and has questioned the motives of Netanyahu and Barak.

Gen. Benny Gantz, the chief of staff, has said that Iran has not yet decided whether to build a nuclear arsenal. Israel's president, Shimon Peres, has reservations about a unilateral Israeli strike. Ehud Olmert, Netanyahu's predecessor, has counselled caution and called on the United States to take the lead.

Barak has condemned Dagan, Diskin and Olmert, archly suggesting that they are serving Iran's interests. Barak's analysis is questionable at best, but Israel's strident denunciation of Iran's nuclear ambitions has already paid dividends, having emboldened western powers, Russia and China to impose credible economic sanctions on the Iranian regime.

By speaking out against a United Church working group's recommendations on Israel, Rev. Andrew Love said he was hoping to swing the church back toward a more balanced and "positive" approach to the Mideast conflict.

The situation in the Middle East is complex, and taking sides only causes friction with the Jewish community, he said.

"I'm concerned that in the name of being in solidarity with the Palestinian people we may be undermining our relationship with the Jewish community," said Rev. Love, pastor at the Grace St. Andrews United Church in Arnprior Ont., west of Ottawa.

Rev. Love was reacting to a recent report by a church committee that called for a boycott of products from Israeli settlements. The group's document, which will be debated at the church's General Council in August, also declared that the deepest meaning of the Holocaust was the loss of dignity for Jews – a statement quickly followed by one saying Palestinians also suffer a loss of dignity under Israeli occupation. The document conditionally rejected the use of the term "apartheid" to describe Israel, but left open the possibility it could be applied if circumstances changed.

"The heart of the issue for me is that I'm concerned the church is eroding the commitment it made in 2003 to strengthen ties to the Jewish community," Rev. Love said, referring to a document adopted that year by the General Council, Bearing Faithful Witness.

Rev. Love said the church should focus on positive ways of bringing Israelis and Palestinians together and not take positions on complex political issues.

He recently launched a website, faithfulwitness.ca, "to gather support from other people concerned about the United Church's drift away from the commitment it made in 2003 to strengthen its ties to the Jewish community."

The site urges others to "join me in calling on the General Council to adopt a more balanced policy. To borrow words from rabbis-letter.org, the Working Group report 'shamefully paints Israel as a pariah nation' that is solely responsible for the violence and conflict with the Palestinians. The authors of the report never hold Palestinians or surrounding Arab nations to moral accountability'," the website states.

Rev. Love, who's been associated with seven churches since being ordained in 2009, believes that "the views reflected in the working group report do not line up with [churchgoers'] views. The average person in the pews is just like me in the sense of looking for more balance and a less one-sided judgment, in this case, a judgment against the State of Israel.

"They feel we should come with more humility and play a more positive role and a less divisive role."

Rev. Love said he "reluctantly came to the conclusion that there's a radical agenda working here, and the folks behind that agenda are better at influencing policy than I am."

Rev. Love said he does not plan to attend the General Council. "I'm not planning any kind of organized effort. I'm just trying to lift up the voice that was behind the 2003 effort to the Jewish community."

He said that since he voiced his opinions in a National Post article, he's received 16 calls from Jews who thanked him for his position.

"I didn't anticipate that, but what it tells me is that it speaks to the real feeling of isolation in part of the Jewish community in Canada, that they're not hearing from the Christian community support, understanding and sensitivity.

"If all I can do here is to say to the Jewish community that there are some of us trying to understand your perspective, then that will be useful."

Jewish contribution to Ontario lauded

Michelle Bitran
Intern

This May marks the first-ever Ontario Jewish Heritage Month, and Torontonians came out to celebrate in style at Beth Torah Congregation last week.

About 150 community members attended the inaugural Jewish Heritage Month celebration on May 7, which included a musical performance by Cantor Simon Spiro, his wife, Aliza, and the Beth Tzedec Singers, as well as presentations on Ontario's Jewish history and a reception with refreshments.

The decision to designate May as Jewish Heritage Month in the province was finalized when Bill 17, presented by Eglinton-Lawrence MPP Mike Colle, and co-sponsored by Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman and Parkdale-High Park MPP Cheri DiNovo, was passed into law in late February of this year. The month of May was chosen because of the frequency of Yom Hashoah and Yom Hazikaron, as well as various Jewish cultural events, occurring during this month.

Colle welcomed the crowd at Beth Torah and explained the importance of honouring Ontario's Jewish community. "This event is about celebrating, it's about recognizing, it's about acknowledging the amazing contributions and achievements that have been made to this province over the past 200 years by the Jewish community," he said, adding that in addition to contributions to the arts, culture, music and academia, Jews in Ontario have made a significant impact on human rights legislation.

Colle was joined by St. Paul's MPP Eric Hoskins; Beth Torah's rabbi, Yossi Sapirman; the director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, Dara Solomon; the executive director of women's philanthropy at the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Susan Jackson, and former CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Bernie Farber.

Farber elaborated on Colle's words about Jewish Ontarians who advocated for human rights. He explained that the concepts of justice and compassion, or tzedek, and tikkun olam, or making the world a better place, are part of the foundation of Judaism.

"The pursuit of dignity and righteousness is specified in our Talmud," said Farber. He added that because of the Jewish People's "historic understanding and experience with discrimination and hatred," they are well placed to understand and to fight for the protection and fair treatment of others.

Despite discrimination, Ontario's Jewish community, now estimated at about 200,000 people, has been thriving for almost 200 years. Jackson's dynamic presentation included the stories about historic Jewish institutions in the province, among them Mount Sinai Hospital, the Kiever Shul in Kensington Market and United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, which recently celebrated its 100-year anniversary.

"We are about our stories," said Jackson, explaining the importance of Ontario's Jewish history. Solomon, in her presentation of materials from the Ontario Jewish Archives, echoed that sentiment.

She showed some of the photographs and postcards that represent only a tiny fraction of the vast collection of letters, videos, films and other historical artifacts held at the archives.

For Solomon, who has only recently begun her work at the archives, it is important that the greater Jewish community be able to easily access the wealth of information about the past. "My plan is to make the archives much more accessible through the various social media tools that are out there," she said.

Hoskins, in his speech, also stressed the importance of sharing and celebrating the history of the province's Jewish community, which has "not only overcome tremendous adversity, but has established itself at the heart of Ontario," he said.

Hoskins added that Jewish contribution has been integral to the province's development and is indivisible from Ontario's growth. "Jewish history and Jewish heritage – really that's Ontario's history and Ontario's heritage."

MITZVAH DAY: On Mitzvah Day, families and staff at the Toronto Heschel School participated in various mitzvot to assist the community. # Seeing the potential in others

Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz

One of the most complex and arcane sections of the Torah deals with a skin disease called nega tzara'at, usually mis-translated as leprosy. Regarding the legal requirement that the diagnosis of this condition must be made by the priest, the Talmud states, "Every nega one may see, except his own." In our inspirational literature, this teaching is often cited in a figurative way: all faults one may see, except his own. This, of course, points to the fact that we see the shortcomings of others with great clarity, but of our own we are oblivious.

We may suggest that this isn't simply a play on words. The metaphoric interpretation is actually the underlying rationale for the legal ruling. For nega tzara'at was never understood to be a simple physical ailment. It was always taken as Divine sign of a sinful act or negative personality trait. If a person was to examine his own nega tzara'at, he undoubtedly would give himself a favourable diagnosis, as an unfavourable one would point to a flaw that he cannot bring himself to see.

To expand on this idea, we may observe that we often have a difficult time seeing ourselves even in a positive light. Why would this be? Certainly we have no problem noting our achievements and successes. Yet, we may have a problem noting our potentialities, especially when they have not been actualized. There's no greater flaw than unrealized potential. By denying this potential, we spare ourselves the pain of facing the fact that we squander it to our own detriment.

To overcome this blind spot, we may need the encouragement of others. Pirkei Avot relates that Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai, leader of the Jewish community in the years following the destruction of the Second Temple, would cite the praises of each of his main disciples. (For example, Rabbi Eliezer ben Hyrkanus was praised as a "plastered cistern that does not lose a drop," a reference to his fantastic memory.) We should assume that this was not simple flattery. Rather, by pointing out their unique strengths, he was forcing them to face the reality of their own potential and rise to the challenge.

Conversely, we find that 24,000 disciples of Rabbi Akiva died for the failure to honour one another. (Mourning this loss is the basis for special observances during the Omer period.) The question has been asked: we know that one of the great teachings of Rabbi Akiva is that the mitzvah to love a fellow Jew is the most fundamental rule of the Torah. Undoubtedly, his disciples absorbed this teaching. If so, how is it possible that they mistreated one another?

The answer is that they did not mistreat one another. The certainly loved each other and would have given the shirt off their backs to friends in need. But they didn't honour one another. That is, they failed to acknowledge the unique characteristics of one another.

Their sin was the failure to enable their colleagues to realize their own potential to the fullest by giving them the needed encouragement. For men who were destined to be future teachers of the Jewish people, this was a fatal flaw.

A proposal for cutting day school fees

As summer approaches, Jewish day school parents in Toronto will soon be getting notifications about tuition fees for next year. Undoubtedly, fees will rise, as they do every year, at two to three times the rate of inflation. This is to be expected, as cost-cutting measures that might be employed in other industries have little impact in a service industry such as education. Unless one wants to replace teachers in the classroom with some form of online learning, cost-cutting is difficult.

Enrolment will once again drop in our day school system. With high school fees hovering at $25,000 (before "extras") it takes very little imagination to realize that a family earning $200,000 a year and paying full tuition for with three children will have great difficulty making ends meet. With taxes of about $65,000 and tuition another $60,000, that leaves a family of five with $75,000 or so to pay for all other expenses! And the vast majority of Jewish families make substantially less than $200,000 a year.

Ironically, as school fees continue to rise, not only are middle class parents dropping out, so are many wealthy ones. With the gap between a Jewish education and elite private schools narrowing, some parents are choosing the latter.

With millions being spent on communal infrastructure, it's not certain that enough Jews will care 30 years from now to make use of all our wonderful new facilities. I'm well aware that the Toronto community gives more support to Jewish education than any other and that there are many pressing needs besides education. So as we hear repeatedly, there just isn't enough money to solve this crisis. After all, how many times can we go back to the same few very wealthy and very generous people and ask for more? Communal funds are tapped out, and to cut tuition in half across the board would cost approximately $100 million a year.

Money Matters

It must be noted that not one additional penny needs to be raised to enable Jewish education to be free in Toronto. A perusal of available public records shows that billions of dollars are sitting in charitable foundations of well-known Jewish philanthropists. That money has already been given away. Unfortunately, very little of it actually goes to charity each year, as capital preservation reigns supreme. If we could change that mindset, the crisis would be solved with the stroke of a pen.

Ah, but if that money is depleted, what will help pay for all other future needs?

The simple answer is that nothing needs to change. The amounts sitting in foundations are so large that all priorities can be paid for, provided one does not feel that capital must be preserved indefinitely. Furthermore, as I have previously argued, as a condition of benefiting from greatly lowered (or free) day school fees, parents can be required to buy life insurance plans at a fraction of the cost of day school fees, the proceeds of which would replenish any "capital depletion."

There's no greater legacy than creating "Birthright Education." Doing so will lead not only to a more engaged community, but to a more giving one, allowing us to support even more worthy causes.

History of Orthodox student group captures the vibrancy of the 1960s

Life for a serious Orthodox Jewish student on a North American university campus presents some challenges, but nothing like those that students experienced 50 years ago.

Walking around campus with a kippah on one's head was unheard of then. Today at York University, for example, many students and faculty members do so without fear or embarrassment. Back then, it was almost unheard of to find kosher food on campus, and accommodations for students with exams scheduled on the Sabbath and Jewish holidays were not as automatic as they are today.

In 1960, the Orthodox student movement, Yavneh, held its founding international convention. Its purpose was, in part, to help individual Orthodox students solve the practical problems that came with attending secular universities. But it was dedicated primarily to more weighty intellectual and spiritual goals: helping students negotiate the perceived conflicts between secular liberal arts and traditional Judaism. Yavneh as an international student movement had enormous successes. The list of community leaders, respected rabbis and leading scholars of Jewish studies who "graduated" from Yavneh is impressive. Yet the movement disappeared around 1980.

A new book, The Greening of American Orthodox Judaism: Yavneh in the 1960s, was published in 2011. The author, the late Prof. Benny Kraut, had just completed the book's manuscript before he died suddenly in 2008. Kraut grew up in Montreal and studied at Yeshiva University and Brandeis University. He had an impressive academic career as a widely respected professor of Jewish studies, first at the University of Cincinnati and then at Queens College of the City University of New York. A modern Orthodox Jew himself, he was profoundly influenced by the years that he spent in Yavneh and admitted that this micro-history book sometimes bordered on memoir.

Before I read it, I was concerned that it might have the unfinished feeling of a work that had not been supervised by its author to the end. But it reads beautifully and tells a fascinating story. Two leading scholars of American Jewry, professors Jonathan Sarna and Chaim Waxman, helped the manuscript along to completion. Sarna has written an insightful forward to the book, while Waxman went over the manuscript carefully and has added some helpful footnotes.

One major theme of the book is the following conundrum: to what degree should Orthodox students have been operating within and co-operating with the general Jewish community – specifically within the framework of Hillel, the community-wide Jewish student group, founded in 1923 – and to what degree did they need to have their own separate Orthodox community? Versions of this question have been relevant for Orthodox Jews for more than 150 years, ever since the modern Orthodox Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch encouraged his congregants to secede from the Grossgemeinde, the Reform-dominated "Main Community" of German Jews.

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

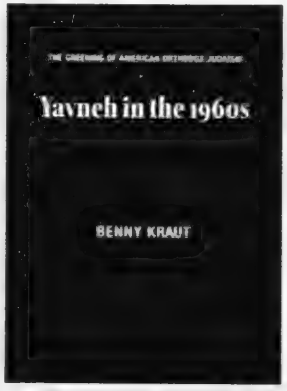
Opponents of Yavneh accused it of fomenting strife in the Jewish student community by working on its own. At the University of Toronto in the mid-1960s, Yavneh Toronto organized a debate on the "Pros and Cons of Zionism," with rabbis Bernard Rosenzweig and J. Immanuel Schochet arguing the two sides, respectively. The (non-Orthodox) Hillel rabbi reacted angrily, arguing that Zionism did not belong to the Orthodox alone and that programs like this should always be done through Hillel. This same rabbi also spread a rumour that Conservative Jewish parents would no longer encourage their children to participate in Hillel because they were apprised that "the Orthodox students were taking over."



The picture Kraut paints of much of the Hillel establishment in the '60s is one of tolerance for many kinds of Jews, as long as they weren't Orthodox. The non-Orthodox Hillel rabbis of the University of Chicago rebuffed a Yavneh attempt to establish a kosher dining room in the Hillel basement for the increasing number of students requesting it – more than 40 by 1965 – "because in their opinion, honouring this request might turn Hillel into an Orthodox hangout and drive away non-Orthodox students." A Barnard student was told by the university president that he would make no accommodation for her eating kosher food, since the campus rabbi had told him that university students in a dorm are like soldiers in the army and are thus (allegedly!) exempt from the rules of kashrut. In short, Kraut builds a strong case for the need for a "separatist" organization such as Yavneh to help students negotiate Orthodox Jewish life on campus in the 1960s.

Fortunately, such challenges for Orthodox Jews on campus are almost gone today. But the book can still make readers wistful for the exciting days of the '60s, when some grassroots student organizations actually had no sponsoring "adult" organization. Besides Yavneh, another example was the Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry (SSSJ). Yavneh was less of a thorn in the side of the adult Jewish establishment than SSSJ. But both were a product of the now-lost spirit of the 1960s – that students could and should do things their own way. Yavneh students produced a number of surprisingly high-level publications, including the Yavneh Review, with essays that are still cited today in Jewish scholarly literature.

Kraut also argues that the intellectual vibrancy of Yavneh is rarely found today in Orthodox groups on university campuses. He contrasts the sincere quest for knowledge and the earnest struggle to deal with the tensions between western values and Judaism, which he found in Yavneh in the '60s, with what he labels the shallowness and narrow-mindedness of too many Orthodox students today. With sadness, he tells the story of the Queens College Orthodox student who asked Kraut whether his Holocaust course would be taught from an Orthodox perspective. The student explained that if that were not the case, he would have to ask his rebbe whether he was permitted to attend.

Kraut realized that some would accuse him of nostalgic exaggeration about the open-mindedness and intellectual vibrancy of the '60s. But readers (especially those of us who lived through the era) will enjoy the entertaining evidence of an exciting but transitory period of American Orthodox Jewish history.

Anti-racism organization publishes book on antisemitism

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

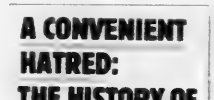
Lamentably, there is no shortage of work for Facing History and Ourselves, a non-profit organization dedicated to combatting antisemitism and racism through education.

Last week, for example, local newspapers reported that police are investigating a complaint that the curriculum of a Toronto Muslim school contains anti-Jewish references.

This is precisely the kind of incident that Facing History and Ourselves, founded in 1976 by two school teachers in the United States, is charged with monitoring and exposing.

"Education is an indispensable tool in fighting antisemitism," said its Toronto office director, Leora Schaefer. "Our mission is to engage adolescents of diverse backgrounds in an examination of racism, prejudice and antisemitism in order to promote the development of a more humane and informed citizenry."

With this objective in mind, Facing History and Ourselves has published A Convenient Hatred: The History of Antisemitism, written by Phyllis Goldstein, one of its senior writers and researchers.



The book, which opens with a chapter on ancient Egypt and closes with an account of contemporary antisemitism, will be discussed by University of Toronto historian Derek Penslar at a public lecture on May 30 at 7:30 p.m. at the Timothy Eaton Memorial Church.

Since its inception 36 years ago, Facing History and Ourselves has grown into an international organization with nine offices in North America, a hub in Britain and partnerships in Israel, China, South Africa and Northern Ireland.

In Canada, in co-operation with the Toronto District School Board, Facing History and Ourselves developed a grade 11 elective course, Genocide and Crimes Against Humanity, in 2008.

Approved by Ontario's Ministry of Education, the course is now taken by more than 500 students in 22 schools around the province.

Facing History and Ourselves also conducts workshops for a number of school boards in Ontario.

Sudbury Jews find 'big tent' too crowded

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

SUDBURY — Since 1941, the size of Sudbury, Ont.'s Jewish population has stayed mostly the same. But changing demographics have led to a fractured community and a synagogue with only 25 active families.

Emily Caruso-Parnell, the president of Sudbury's Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue, compared the situation at the shul to a church with the members of every denomination under one roof.

"Imagine that one church had to hold everyone… from the United Church to the Greek Orthodox… and they all had to share a building. That's sort of the spectrum we're looking at," Caruso-Parnell said.

"It's very challenging to accommodate all those differences in practice and differences in belief within one tent. It's got to be a pretty big tent."

"At this time, there is no specific affiliation," said Scott Goldstein, who sits on the Shaar Hashomayim board. "In terms of practice, it's more of a combination of Conservative and Reform. It used to be more of a Conservative and Orthodox mixture, but now it's moved toward the Conservative egalitarian type of practice."

When Sudbury's first Jewish settler arrived in the late 1800s and others followed in the years after, a Jewish presence was quickly established in the downtown area through a number of thriving businesses and a bustling social life in the then tight-knit community.

Nowadays, getting supplies for Jewish holidays means taking a trip to Toronto or Montreal, and the social life is not nearly as active as it used to be.

Some of Sudbury's Jewish residents say the dwindling interest in being involved with the community comes from the difficulty in trying to appeal to people with different levels of religious commitment, as well as the lack of interest from younger Jews.

Judi Cartman, who moved to Sudbury in 1970, said the Jewish population has decreased substantially since she arrived.

"When we moved here, there were 70-some families, active families that really participated [in the synagogue]. I find that for a lot of the younger people today, [Judaism] doesn't mean as much to them."

Dan Rothschild was the first Jew to come to Sudbury. He arrived around 1883 and earned his keep by selling merchandise to labourers. His brother, Max Rothschild, arrived a year later.

Aaron Silverman came to Sudbury from Poland in 1889, when he was 18. He sold clothes to workers at construction camps along the railroad line, and by 1892, was able to rent a small shack to run his business.

David and Lewis Jacobs, Harry Endelman, Abraham Weisman and Hyman Ironstone were also among the first Jewish settlers to the Sudbury region.

Vivian Field, who has lived in Sudbury for 54 years, was Hyman Ironstone's granddaughter. Ironstone moved to Sudbury with his family around 1906.

"He was what they called a pedlar," Field said. "He travelled… to all these little towns like Wahnipitae and sold dry goods. He then established a menswear store in Sudbury (Ironstone Men's Wear)."

Aaron Silverman's small shack eventually became Silverman's Department Store, the first department store in Sudbury. Dan Rothschild ran a general store, D. Rothschild and Company, and his brother, Max Rothschild, owned a butcher shop next door.

Abraham Weisman opened a store in 1898, selling chocolate, ice cream and cigarettes. In 1907, Hascal Moses built a newsstand, which later became Wolfe's Bookstore. In 1930, he took over the Sudbury Hotel and ran it until 1949.

In 1917, the Women's Auxiliary/Sisterhood group was established. Thirteen of the Jewish community's most prominent women were on the executive. Rose Ironstone, Hyman Ironstone's wife, was the first president.

The group ran annual Chanukah and Purim parties, as well as dances and picnics by the lake. The annual picnic was always very successful, and a favourite activity in the community.

All the proceeds from the activities went to a number of different causes and charities, including supporting the local shul. Donations were also made to the Red Cross and the Ukrainian Orphan's Fund, and to support poor Jews in Palestine. Local Jews in need were also supported.

In June 1987, the largest social event involving the Jewish community was held – the 75th anniversary of Shaar Hashomayim. It attracted people from all over Canada. Judy Cartman and Mitchell Spiegel co-chaired the event. More than 200 people came, some of whom had moved away from Sudbury as much as 60 years earlier.

The Dorothy Rothschild chapter of Hadassah (now Canadian Hadassah-WIZO) was started in 1928. Teas that were held by the chapter were enormously popular, attracting even those outside the Jewish community.

Nowadays, Caruso-Parnell said, the social scene is very different.

"Continuing to maintain traditions and keep holidays when there isn't any public infrastructure within which to do that – there aren't big Chanukah parties organized, or a big Jewish community centre, for instance.

"Everything you [want done], you have to do yourself, and we have to do within our little community… It's certainly more challenging in that way. There isn't the support system [there was in the past]."

The challenges involved with being Jewish in Sudbury are numerous, its residents say – everything from preparing for holidays to keeping kosher to keeping the community united, attracting those who aren't involved and having access to Jewish education.

Scott Goldstein, who teaches at the Shaar's Hebrew school, pinpointed the lack of varied educational opportunities as an issue.

"I teach the Hebrew school on Sundays, but somebody who's looking for a more inclusive and comprehensive Jewish education for their children, that can be a difficult thing to achieve here in Sudbury.

"Going once a week on Sundays can be enough for some and may not be enough for others."

Antisemitism is present, but most say it doesn't occur very often.

In an interview with the Ontario Jewish Archives a few years ago, Judy Feld-Carr, who is known for her efforts in rescuing Syrian Jews and was raised in Sudbury, said that when she attended a Catholic school, she was on the receiving end of a lot of antisemitism. She described one incident when she had some of her teeth knocked out by her classmates.

Last year, Daniel Benzimra, the president of Laurentian University's Jewish Student Association, found swastikas drawn or carved on bathroom walls.

When Vivian Field's oldest son was in high school, she said, a boy threw rocks at their window and told his friend he was going Jew hunting.

Cartman, who sits on the Greater Sudbury Police Service's race relations board, said that "there are problems.

"There's problems at the university. I know that there are. I hear it at my board meetings. It's something we've been working really, really hard to be proactive about so that nothing really bad happens."

"There are periodically things that crop up, someone graffitis a swastika on something," Caruso-Parnell said. "We have a good relationship with the police, which we use to deal with that, and we also have a very good relationship with the other religious communities in the city… that really is preventative as far as avoiding some of those tensions."

Cambrian College brings Holocaust survivor Eva Olsson to Sudbury regularly to speak to students.

Perhaps the most serious problem is the continuing decline in interest in keeping the Jewish community alive and united.

"I find that for a lot of the younger people today, [Judaism] doesn't mean as much to them," Cartman said. "It's a problem bringing people to the different faith groups and keeping them. It's not as important to them as it was when we were growing up and it was a centre for being with your own kind. It doesn't seem to be as important to the younger people today as it was to us.

"There's a big, diverse community, and there's people who want to be Reform, there's people who want to be Humanist. There are not enough of us to be able to do that and work together, as hard as we try," she added.

"It used to be [close]. Not anymore. I find it really hard. You try to do something together and you almost split in two, three and four. It's just not a really good feeling."

Notable Jews

Aaron Silverman: Opened and ran Silverman's, Sudbury's first department store.

Dan Rothschild: The first Jew to settle in Sudbury. He ran D. Rothschild's Sudbury Cheap Store.

Saul Silverman: He helped establish Sudbury General Hospital and Laurentian University and was the first chairman of the hospital board.

Judy Feld-Carr: Over a 28-year period, she negotiated the release of 3,000 Syrian Jews from the Syrian government. The negotiations were conducted in complete secrecy.

Max Silverman, left: Coach of the Sudbury Wolves OHL team, he led them to victory in the 1934-35 season. He was elected deputy mayor of Sudbury in 1962, and then mayor in 1966, but died during his first year in office.

Sam Rothschild: The first Jewish hockey player in the NHL and the first Sudburian to play on a Stanley Cup-winning team, he was the president of the Northern Ontario Curling Association.

Joe Ironstone: The second Jewish hockey player in the NHL, he played only one game for the Toronto Maple Leafs because he wanted more money than hockey players received at the time. His family, the Ironstones, was among the first to sponsor Shaar Hashomayim.

Israeli play has a personal side

Meir Shenhav
Special to The CJN

I sit in the coffee shop, and when my name is announced in a heavy Hebrew accent, I go to get my coffee.

I'm waiting for three ladies, and the Hebrew tone is appropriate, as we're going to talk about Israeli culture.

The play He Walked Through the Fields, written by Moshe Shamir will be on stage this month at the Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal JCC in downtown Toronto.

I'm meeting with Galya Sarner, director of the Israeli Project at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, Yael Shamir Feingold, the play's director, and Tami Berman the producer.

Hamifgash Theatre is known as the only Hebrew speaking theatre in Toronto. Is there a real need for such an institution?

Sarner: The theatre started four years ago, aiming to meet some of the Israeli community's cultural needs. After two years, we realized that we could bring together other communities to enjoy the Israeli culture, to learn about Israel's history and its unique needs.

It also helps us to expose other pleasant sides of our homeland.

By adding English subtitle translation, we create the opportunity to open up the performances to a wider audience.

The theatre was established by a group of volunteers, with the support of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre in early 2008. The Mifgash has enjoyed considerable success, having performed all its productions to sold out audiences and rave reviews.

What is He Walked Through the Fields, about?

Sarner: This play reflects, in many ways, the conflict that Israelis are facing, wherever there are. It tells the story of a young man who, upon returning to his kibbutz from his studies, falls in love with a young Holocaust survivor. He soon finds himself torn between remaining on the kibbutz with his family and his love and going off to fight for the new state.

The play paints a vivid and dramatic picture of the new generation of native Israelis prior to the founding of the state.

Rumour has it that there's a personal side to the production of this play.

Sarner: This year's production has a special meaning for our theatre group, as our resident director is also the author's daughter. This year would have been the anniversary of Mr. Shamir's 90th birthday.

Can the Mifgash Theatre create a bridge between the Jewish Canadian community and the Israeli community?

Berman: Mifgash offers all Jews in the Greater Toronto Area an opportunity to meet and express their diversity on a common ground of acceptance and unity.

Through experiences working specifically with the Israeli Canadian community, they have learned to appreciate the need and desire for special Israeli cultural and community events. The need to express identity, language and culture is not unique only to the Israeli community, but to other communities as well. By creating a theatre for all these diverse backgrounds to give their experience a cultural and artistic voice, they can take important steps toward creating a more unified Jewish community where all backgrounds are embraced.

Would you also welcome non-Israelis to join the cast?

Feingold: Everyone who wants to be an actor is welcome to join us. Of course, it's voluntary.

Would you consider producing plays with Jewish-Israeli orientation in English as well?

Sarner: The sky is the limit... hopefully we will be able to expand our theatre in the near future, and run plays in English as well.

Talking about Israeli culture feels like jumping to a beloved home for a brief visit. As the waiter asks us in Hebrew if he can clean our table, we all smile and say our goodbyes.

Tolerance is the real lesson in madrassah mess

Guest Voice

The recent story of the East End Madrassah's inflammatory curriculum sparked substantial media coverage. Rightly so, for it's not every day that one finds school texts in Canada alleging that "treacherous" Jews "conspired to kill the Prophet Muhammad." Much credit must be given to the National Post's Stewart Bell, whose investigative reporting pointed to a disturbing link between passages from the curriculum and texts issued by Iran's ayatollahs.

Brigitte Pellerin of Sun News showed an admirable passion in condemning the curriculum, and the fact the madrassah used a Toronto public school for its Sunday classes. Pellerin charged: "Everybody who's decent should be horrified and offended by this kind of teaching… this should not just be a matter of Jewish people being offended."

Pellerin's observation reflected the general media consensus, despite one partially dissenting voice – the Post's Jonathan Kay. I preface this criticism by declaring myself an avid reader of Kay, whose great mind and sharp pen are undeniable. But even great minds miss the mark on rare occasions.

In a piece headlined "The problem with calling the Koran 'anti-Semitic,'" Kay argued that when it comes to hate, the curriculum is "a major let-down." On the blood libel that Jews plotted to murder Muhammad, Kay stated that to call this antisemitic hate speech would require labelling "the whole Koran 'anti-Semitic hate speech.' And where does that get you? To the same awkward place that calling the Bible 'homophobic hate speech' gets you. Either you tolerate an established religion and its ancient, hateful (whether to Jews or gays) texts, or you don't."

Kay suggests an equivalence between contentious passages of the Tanach and the New Testament on one hand and anti-Jewish diatribes in a 21st-century Islamic curriculum on the other. The distinction, as letter writers to the Post noted, is one of interpretation and application today. And on this point, there is no equivalence.

Whether one agrees or disagrees with elements of Jewish and Christian holy texts, neither faith is facing the internal crisis of global religious terrorism in 2012. I can think of no violent rupture within Judaism or Christianity today that even remotely compares to the murderous feud taking place between Shi'a and Sunni Muslims. And when it comes to Canada, the risks of faith-based extremism are incomparable. I have personally attended services at churches and synagogues in various parts of our country. I have attended both Jewish and Christian Bible studies. In all of that experience, I cannot recall – not even once – the teaching of a hateful conspiracy theory against another community.

On Islam, I do not claim to be an authority. But if you heed the warnings of those who are experts, such as Irshad Manji, anti-Jewish extremism is more common within elements of the Islamic community than most Canadians would be comfortable with (including many Canadian Muslims themselves). All of which leads us back to Pellerin's incisive comment, which unmasked the deeper issue at stake. As offensive as the East End Madrassah's curriculum was to the Jewish community, it serves as a test for all Canadians.

Every Canadian deserves the right to observe their faith, raise their children in their traditions and pursue their aspirations in freedom. But whether one's family arrived here two weeks ago or two centuries ago (as did my own), one must accept the responsibilities of being Canadian just as one enjoys the rights of being Canadian. This includes the basic responsibility of every parent to teach their children what it means to coexist in peace with their neighbours in a free and pluralistic country. In using religion to train young people to despise Jews, the East End Madrassah has turned this principle on its head – and therein lies the test for every Canadian, Jew and non-Jew alike. Do we believe our country's core values to be unchanging and non-negotiable, or are these values nothing more than platitudes?

11th Annual Book of Life Celebration

EVERY LIFE HAS A STORY... WHAT IS YOURS?

Over 500 guests celebrated the lives and values of 24 honourees at an annual event that over the past 10 years has become an inspiring tradition in our community.

Lesley Binstock Offman, Chair of this year's event spoke about what it means to leave a legacy through the Jewish Foundation:

"The Book of Life is an amazing celebration because it reminds us that time passes in moments. Sometimes the moments rush past us. We rarely stop to examine the path our lives are taking or slow down enough to see the reasons why things happen - especially these days. But tonight, we slow down and take stock of each precious moment.

I sincerely congratulate our honourees for sharing their lives with us; for having the commitment and courage to open up and give us a glimpse of the moments that shaped their strongest sense of Jewish values."

The Book of Life now contains 261 stories contributed by individuals, families, groups and societies who have made a gift in perpetuity. Each story is unique, yet when bound together, they create a precious chronicle of our shared commitment to tikkun olam.

If you would like to create your Jewish legacy and include your story in the Book of Life, please contact Janice Benatar at 416-631-5847 or email jbenatar@ujafed.org.

Gifts to the Foundation can be in the form of an endowment fund, bequest in a will or the donation of a life insurance policy. Stories and details about the Book of Life can be read at www.bookoflife.ca.

Courts don't always enforce support guidelines

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 31 years

Question: I have not been living with my wife for the past 10 months. Am I legally separated from her? If I buy property (a house) after I am separated, what happens? Is it considered a conjugal property?

Answer: No. Legal separation in Ontario usually means that you no longer reside in the same residence, or if you do, then you lead separate lives under one roof. Thereafter, any property purchased after separation cannot be the subject of valuation for the purposes of equalizing your respective net worth positions, which in family law is called your "net family property."

However, depending on how and when the property is purchased, there may be exceptions to this rule. If you have used jointly-owned funds to buy property shortly after you separated, a court would likely rule that the property must be shared equally.

Question: Under the new spousal support guidelines introduced by Justice Canada, the bureaucrats' cookie-cutter formula calls for virtual equalization of incomes, irrespective of the spouse's needs (the previous criteria). Why doesn't someone challenge this insipid procedure and go back to a needs-based system? No wonder spouses try to duck out!

Answer: Depends on which duck you're trying to avoid, and which cookie-cutter. Say the payer does not have custody of the child (or children), was residing together with the payee in a lengthy relationship, and Mom was largely dependent on his income to help raise their family. In such cases the law was developed well before the new advisory Spousal Support Guidelines.

Such mothers will require as much as 50-60 cents of every after-tax dollar earned between them. If Dad earns a lot more, then it would be unfair to leave him with even 50 cents of earned income monthly, since between spousal and child support the custodial parent has more mouths to feed, clothe and shelter.

Similarly, even without dependent kids, if the wife sacrificed most of her working life and raised the family so that Dad could build his income, then the courts will still often equalize incomes, with or without the guidelines. But sometimes the guidelines go too far and are too generous, especially since they often fail to consider the payer's needs and child-related costs.

Conversely, if it's a short marriage with no kids, the guidelines do not usually recommend much, if any, spousal support.

Guidelines are not law

The Spousal Guidelines are not law. They are merely advisory and are quite often either ignored or downplayed by the courts. Two recent important Ontario court decisions have even ruled that the Spousal Support Advisory Guidelines do not apply to interim or temporary requests or "motions" for spousal support orders prior to trial.

It is perfectly natural for spouses seeking separation to desire a fair resolution and to feel strongly that their position is justified. But don't make the mistake of thinking that your ability to eloquently express your overwhelming conviction that you are right will sway a Judge.

A Judge is interested in detail, not drama; facts, not opinions. An experienced family law lawyer knows how to identify the relevant facts, assemble and present them in an orderly, systematic way. This approach is still your best bet for a fair result.

Legacy fund established for CISEPO founder

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Ear, nose and throat specialist Dr. Arnold Noyek has devoted his career to fighting congenital deafness here and in the Middle East, and in the process he's helped to build bridges between Arabs and Israelis.

To celebrate his achievements, the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation is holding a tribute dinner on Sunday, June 3, at the Fairmont Royal York under the patronage of Prince Firas Raad of Jordan and Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin. Proceeds will go to the Dr. Arnold M. Noyek Legacy Fund being set up by the foundation.

In 1984, Dr. Arnold Noyek founded the Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), based at Mount Sinai and linked to the University of Toronto and York University, as an international network of academics, researchers, educators, students and health professionals working together to improve health care and education under a Canadian umbrella.

In 1995, the late King Hussein of Jordan invited Noyek to build relations between Israelis and Arabs in the health sector following the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan in 1994. Palestinian academics and their institutions joined the effort in 1997.

Noyek began organizing conferences across the Middle East in Tel Aviv, Amman, Nablus, Gaza, Haifa and Jerusalem. Through a series of CISEPO- and U of T-sponsored continuing education events, Noyek discovered high rates of genetic neural hearing loss in the region due to a high number of cousins marrying within extended families.

"The big-kept secret is the factor of genetics. We discovered that hearing loss due to genetic problems was six to 10 times more prevalent in the Middle East than any other place on the globe," Noyek said, "and this was a direct result of intermarriage."

The goal of CISEPO is to educate local doctors and health professionals to properly diagnose and manage hearing-loss problems in newborns, infants and children. Universal screening for hearing loss in newborns is, Noyek hopes, the first step to providing care to needy Middle East populations, while, at the same time, building people-to-people relations.

"We are a team of Canadian, American, Israeli, Jordanian, and Palestinian individuals and institutions," Noyek said.

"CISEPO is creating opportunities for peaceful coexistence, building co-operation and trust, identifying and sharing information about health problems experienced by children and families of every background together in Canada and the Middle East to better the lives of ordinary people."

Noyek was born to Irish Jews in Dublin, Ireland and immigrated to Canada in 1940 as an only child with parents who were socially conscious, as well as generous contributors to the community.

"I knew I wanted to be a doctor when I was in grade school. I liked the idea of helping people," Noyek recalled.

After graduating from U of T's medical school, Noyek trained in otolaryngology – the ear, nose and throat specialty – at the Manhattan Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital in New York.

On staff at Mount Sinai since 1966, Noyek served as otolaryngologist-in-chief from 1989 to 2002. He's also a consultant with Baycrest, as well as a professor at U of T.

Due to the efforts of researchers in Noyek's department at Mount Sinai Hospital, Ontario adopted universal newborn hearing screening as policy in 2001, making the province a world pioneer. This policy became the model for CISEPO's parallel efforts in the Middle East.

"Dr. Arnold Noyek is for me the ultimate proof that one person can truly change the world. Armed with endless devotion, unparalleled resourcefulness and undeterred persistence, he has touched the lives of thousands of families all across the Middle East," Gissin said. "No other Canadian I know has made such a difference on the ground among the people of the Middle East – Muslim, Christian and Jewish – and I am very proud to call him a friend."

For information on the dinner, call 416-586-4800, ex. 7329.

CHIDON HATANACH WINNERS: Yeshivat Or Chaim students Ariel Kelman, Grade 11, left, and Shlomo Witty, Grade 9, right, tied for second place in the National Chidon Hatanach Bible contest in Toronto on May 6 and 7. The two are among three students from Toronto who will compete in the international Chidon Hatanach in Israel next year on Yom Ha'atzmaut. They're pictured with their teacher, Ofra Gemara, who helped to prepare them for the competition.

Hillel's new chair anticipates 'year of transition'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto's incoming chair of the board of directors said he's looking forward to an academic year filled with changes, challenges and transition.

"We see this year as a year of transition, both in light of our leadership changes, our structural changes and our increasing emphasis on peer-to-peer engagement. With all those challenges ahead of us, it's a year I'm looking forward to," said Shelly Feld, who officially replaces the outgoing chair of the board, Lindy Goodman, during Hillel's May 16 annual general meeting.

Feld, a lawyer for the Mutual Fund Dealers Association of Canada, began volunteering with Hillel in 2006 and has since served as the board's vice-chair and strategic planning committee's chair.

But his dedication to promoting the benefits of Jewish campus life dates back to the 1980s, when he served as president of the Coalition of Western Jewish Students at the University of Western Ontario and as the Jewish University Student Network's central region vice-president.

"I've always been inspired and I've always recognized the importance of the student experience within the Jewish community. I cherish my own experiences as a Jewish student activist both at the high school and university level," said Feld, who recently participated in UJA of Greater Toronto's Joshua Institute for Jewish Communal Leadership program.

Shelly Feld

"The university campus is one of the last frontiers for us to connect with young Jewish individuals to bring them on board their own personal Jewish journey and ensure that they are engaged and make an enduring commitment to the community as they mature."

Feld said one of his responsibilities as the new chair will be to focus on helping the student organization adapt to some structural changes that will take place this year.

For example, there are plans to create a new position, an executive director who will oversee all the Hillels throughout Ontario.

"We expect and hope this will result in greater synergy between other campuses around Ontario. Our view is that the campuses in Toronto are somewhat distinct in that they are commuter campuses with a very diverse Jewish student body with representation from smaller communities, such as Israeli and Russian students, who are certainly present in greater numbers in Toronto."

Another big change facing Hillel Toronto is the expected departure of Zac Kaye, the executive director since 1995, who plans to retire at the end of the next academic year.

Despite all the upcoming changes, Feld said he's confident in his 24-member board and the five-year strategic plan they adopted last year.

Feld explained that Hillel's focus has evolved to accommodate new communication trends, such as Twitter and Facebook, and now creates programming that emphasizes "direct, peer-to-peer engagement."

"We've identified in our strategic plan, four particular objectives. Our first objective is to connect with a greater number of students, to engage with them in a more meaningful way to truly cultivate their experience and foster more diverse and meaningful Jewish experiences, and to truly elevate their experience and empower them to take a more active role in the community," Feld said.

Chabad grant comes under scrutiny

Compiled by CJN staff

A $1-million federal grant to Chabad Lubavitch of Markham to improve accessibility at its social hall has come under scrutiny.

Reports out of Ottawa and Toronto last week noted that a funding request submitted by Rabbi Chaim Mendelsohn of the Canadian Federation of Chabad Lubavitch to the government's Enabling Accessibility Fund program had initially failed to qualify based on evaluation by bureaucrats in Human Resources and Skills Development Canada, the ministry that administers the $12 million fund.

John Baird

A May 11 report in the Globe and Mail noted that Chabad's submission garnered a score of 53 out of a possible 100 points used to grade submissions to the fund.

The ministry's stated minimum point threshold for granting funds was set at 82.

However, the Globe's report also notes that despite its low score, Chabad was awarded a grant after Human Resources Minister Diane Finley spoke with Foreign Minister John Baird.

Ministers can override bureaucratic decisions of this nature because they control spending in their departments.

Baird has been closely associated with the Ottawa-based Rabbi Mendelsohn, even going so far as saying that even though he is not Jewish, he has a rabbi. The two were also part of the same Canadian delegation that visited Israel this past January along with Finance Minister Jim Flaherty.

Rabbi Mendelsohn told the Globe he was unsure how his submission was scored, but was gratified that Baird, whom he called "a dear friend," spoke highly of his organization.

A spokesperson at Baird's office confirmed that Baird had spoken to Finley about the Chabad project and that the foreign minister was "happy to lend Rabbi Mendelsohn his support."

Robbins celebrates 50 years

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Kids from junior kindergarten through Grade 8 arrived by the busload to the grounds of the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre last Thursday to celebrate the Robbins Hebrew Academy's (RHA) 50th anniversary.

The school celebrated its milestone birthday earlier this year with a gala event for parents, staff and alumni, but Thursday's outdoor activity-filled celebration was just for kids.

"The school is really about the kids," said Claire Sumerlus, the RHA head of school, adding that it was important to her that the children get the opportunity to celebrate the school's half-century mark in a way that would be fun for them. "We figured, 'What's better than a field day, or a fun day?'" she said.

Fun was certainly on the agenda as the students swooped around and through hula hoops, kicked soccer balls and knocked down plastic bowling pins, hardly noticing the chilly spring weather.

The students, who were bussed in from both the Bathurst Street and Bayview Avenue campuses, were also treated to hotdogs, cake and lemonade to keep up their energy for the obstacle courses and sports activities.

"Even though this is only a snapshot of these 50 years, this is what the school is about," said Sumerlus, motioning to the students playing together, the older students guiding the younger ones through the activities.

Sumerlus, who has been the head of school at RHA for the last three years, explained that an outdoor, active celebration was chosen as a way to promote physical activity among the students. This is part of the school's ongoing effort to increase physical activity, which is most noticeable in the recent implementation of a 20-minute exercise period before the start of the school day for students in grades 1 through 5.

Another important aspect of the event was the leadership of the grades 7 and 8 students. Many of these students arrived early to set up the obstacle course stations, and later they were leading and instructing the younger grades through their rotations at each of the stations.

"They are the leaders of the school," said Sumerlus proudly of the older students. She also noted that although the students had come from two different campuses, many of them had gotten to know one another through joint school events, and were able to get along well and to work together. Sumerlus said that she hopes to increase the number of joint campus events, so that the students are able to bond more.

RHA began at its Bathurst campus location as a Beth Tzedec Synagogue school in 1957 and became an independent school, under the name United Synagogue Day School (USDS), in the 1961-62 school year.

Today, the Bathurst campus still operates out of Beth Tzedec, and since 1969, the Bayview campus has been running out of Beth Tikvah Synagogue. A Richmond Hill campus was opened in 1987, but was closed in 2006. The school is an affiliate of the Conservative movement's Schechter Day School Network, but teaches students from all branches of Judaism.

USDS became RHA in 2010, after Toronto builder and USDS grandparent Larry Robbins gave a $4-million gift to the school in memory of his late wife, Miriam.

Throughout its history, RHA has continued to provide Judaic and general studies education to hundreds of children each year from preschool through Grade 8, something that Sumerlus takes great pride in. "It's a really exciting place to be," she said of the school. "It's an amazing feat to say we've been educating Jewish children for 50 years."

Netanyahu reaches out to renew peace talks

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's new national unity government has created an opportunity to advance the peace process, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu wrote to Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas in a letter sent last Saturday night.

Netanyahu added that he wants to restart negotiations as soon as possible. Since taking office, Netanyahu has told U.S. President Barack Obama and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton that he could not advance the peace process because of the composition of his coalition.

Clinton, who spoke with Netanyahu last week, told him that with Kadima now part of the coalition, she is waiting to see how he will move the diplomatic process forward.

Netanyahu's letter to Abbas was delivered to PA headquarters in Ramallah by his special envoy Isaac Molho, who met with Abbas for 90 minutes.

Following the meeting, the two issued a joint statement saying that Israel and the Palestinian Authority are obligated to achieve peace, and that the parties hope the exchange of letters between Netanyahu and Abbas will help move them closer to this end. Molho's meeting with Abbas was, in fact, a reciprocal visit: three weeks ago PA negotiations chief Saeb Erekat and Palestinian intelligence head Majed Faraj met with Netanyahu and delivered a letter from Abbas. In that letter, Abbas accused Netanyahu of weakening the PA.

A source who saw the letter that Netanyahu sent to Abbas said it included, for the first time in an official state document, an official pledge by Netanyahu to establish a demilitarized Palestinian state in keeping with the principle of a two-state solution.

Netanyahu declared his support for such a solution in a speech at Bar-Ilan University in 2009, as well as when he addressed the U.S. Congress in May 2011. However, he has never brought the matter to a cabinet vote, nor had he set it down in an official document, until now.

Abbas met with the Palestine Liberation Organization executive committee and the Fatah central committee on Sunday to discuss Netanyahu's letter. After the meeting, the PLO executive committee released a statement that said Netanyahu's letter contained no clear answers to essential issues: first and foremost, a halt to construction in the settlements and east Jerusalem, recognition of the 1967 borders and the release of prisoners.

A member of the Fatah central committee, Mohammed Shtayeh, who was present at Sunday's meetings, said Netanyahu's letter contained no new proposals or ideas.

Despite Palestinian disappointment with the letter, they did not reject it outright.

The Palestinian leadership will decide its next moves after consulting with the Arab countries and the PA's friends worldwide, Abbas said on Sunday at the central committee meeting.

The United States is pressing Abbas to use the letters as a means of moving toward direct talks with Israel. The Americans reportedly would like to see a resumption of the talks between Molho and Erekat, which took place in January in Amman, under the patronage of King Abdullah of Jordan.

Coalition to deal with Haredi army exemption

Uriel Heilman

Israel's new unity government could dramatically change something many Israelis care deeply: haredi exemptions from military service.

Nearly every government in recent years has needed the haredi parties to cobble together a governing coalition, rendering haredi entitlement programs such as the military exemption politically untouchable.

Analysis

This long has irritated Israelis who serve in the army and resent that the haredim, by and large, do not serve yet draw all sorts of entitlement payments from the state.

But with Shaul Mofaz's decision to bring his Kadima party and its 28 seats into the ruling coalition, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu no longer needs the haredi parties to keep his government in power. They could pull out, and it would make no real difference – at least until the elections that are scheduled for October 2013.

Already there is movement to find an alternative to the Tal Law, which granted military exemptions to haredi Israeli men but was struck down several months ago by Israel's Supreme Court. The court ordered that an alternative to the law be put into place by Aug. 1.

Crafting an alternative to the Tal Law is one of the priorities set forth by the new government coalition, and it may be a potential historical legacy of the 18-month alliance between Netanyahu and Mofaz.

Last week, the Jerusalem Post reported that under the Mofaz-Netanyahu deal, haredi exemptions from the army would be replaced by a Basic Law requiring all citizens to perform military or civilian service.

Last month, Kadima proposed instituting a universal military draft within five years. Under the Kadima plan, all Israelis either would serve in the military or do national service in a variety of fields, among them education, health and domestic security. Those who fail to comply would be barred from receiving any state funding.

The question is whether such a plan, could survive opposition from Israel's haredi parties. Netanyahu doesn't need them to survive in office until the next elections. Indeed, if he were to push through such legislation, it could earn his Likud party much broader support, including from secular and more centrist voters, the next time Israel goes to the polls.

But it could cost Netanyahu in October 2013 if Likud wins the election, Kadima fares poorly and Netanyahu needs the haredi parties to form a coalition.

Some other factors are at play, too.

For one thing, while in principle most Israelis would like haredim to be subject to the same requirements of service demanded of all other Israelis, in practice the army does not want a sudden flood of tens of thousands of new haredi recruits. The Israel Defence Forces lacks the infrastructure to absorb them, both in numbers and operationally. What would the army do with 10,000 new recruits who are opposed to significant interaction with female instructors?

Also, a dramatic transformation of the relationship between haredim and the state would run up against opposition not only from haredi parties in the Knesset but from haredi citizens. Mass demonstrations and even riots likely would ensue. The reality is that Israel doesn't want all these haredim in the army. What Israel wants is more haredi men working, paying taxes and integrated into Israeli society.

Under the current system, haredi men must stay in yeshiva until their 30s to keep their military exemption. Haredi women are granted exemptions from army service upon request. That has helped bankrupt the haredi community and nurture a black-market economy in which many haredi men work surreptitiously and do not pay taxes.

Changing the rule would help drive haredim into the workforce and into better-paying jobs. That would help Israel's tax rolls and reduce haredi dependency on welfare.

Some haredim see these changes as key to the economic and social survival of their community. But other haredi leaders see it as opening up a slippery slope away from the yeshiva and Jewish observance and toward the dangerous temptations of modern, secular Israel.

Kadima has proposed exempting 1,000 haredi yeshiva students from the military draft and allowing others to defer military service on a year-by-year basis while they are studying in yeshiva. According to a report in the Jerusalem Post, Likud is likely to propose an alternative that instead would establish a minimum number of haredi participants in national service programs that would increase every year without a cap on those claiming yeshiva-related exemptions from service.

For now, the haredi parties appear to be taking a wait-and-see approach.

"There can't be a situation in Israel in 2012 where someone who wants to study Torah will not be able to do so," Yakov Litzman of the United Torah Judaism party told the Post. "But as long as the principle of 'Torato Omunato' [Torah is one's work] is preserved, UTJ will remain in the coalition."

Peace deal with Israel gets thumbs down in Egypt

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — Egyptian presidential hopefuls Amr Moussa and Abdel Moneim Abol Fotouh said in a televised debate on May 10 that Israel is an adversary and an enemy, and pledged to review Egypt's peace treaty with the country.

The two election front-runners, a former foreign minister and a moderate Islamist, squared off in the Arab world's first-ever presidential debate, watched by millions across the Arab world. The two sought to trip each other up during the four-hour debate, on questions ranging from their perspective on Islamic sharia law to their views on Israel. The debate was broadcast on two privately owned television channels.

The candidates repeatedly accused each other of distorting the facts.

Both said they would review Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel, a country Abol Fotouh described as an enemy and Moussa called an adversary. Last month, Moussa told told an election rally in southern Egypt that the Camp David agreement was "dead and buried."

As the debate moved to foreign policy in the early hours of the morning, the veteran diplomat Moussa made a gaffe, when he called Iran an Arab state.

A former member of the Muslim Brotherhood, Abol Fotouh portrayed Moussa as a member of the Hosni Mubarak government that had corrupted Egypt. "There's a rule that says that one who created the problem cannot solve it," the 60-year-old said.

Moussa, who was head of the Arab League at the time of the uprising, defended his record as Egypt's foreign minister but added that he had left the post in 2001.

"The regime that fell, fell with Moussa outside of it," the 75-year-old said. "I say, you too were silent. You used to defend the positions of the Muslim Brotherhood and not Egyptian interests."

The two are among 13 candidates competing in the election, due to begin on May 23.

Other contenders include Mohamed Mursi, the Muslim Brotherhood's candidate; Ahmed Shafiq, Mubarak's last prime minister; and Hamdeen Sabahy, a leftist. The organisers of last week's debate said Moussa and Abol Fotouh had been invited because they were ahead in the polls.

The debate repeatedly swivelled back to Moussa and Abol Fotouh's past lives.

Moussa asked Abol Fotouh about an oath he had pledged to the religious guide of the Brotherhood: "What does this oath mean? Does it mean that if you are elected you will have [another] president?"

Abol Fotouh replied: "It seems Amr Moussa doesn't follow the news carefully and doesn't know that I resigned from the Muslim Brotherhood after I decided to run for the presidency in April 2011. This resignation was because I wanted to be free to serve the nation – to be a president for all Egyptians."

Moussa accused him of double-speak, asking how he had managed to win endorsement from both liberals and hardline Salafi Islamists. "With Salafis, he is a Salafi. With liberals, he is a liberal. With centrists, he is a centrist," he said.

The tension, which appeared to build throughout the debate, manifested itself in scathing closing remarks.

Moussa urged Egyptians not to vote for a man he said was unclear in his policies and was not qualified to lead a state, accusing him of "forging history."

"I am sorry to say that we must warn the Egyptian people," Moussa said. "The next president must have certain qualifications that can lead the country."

Abol Fotouh shot back by saying that a vote for Moussa would be a step backwards. "We are for the first time choosing the president of Egypt," he said. "I hope that we don't allow ourselves to be taken back, once again, to the fallen regime, with its ideas, its substance and figures," he said.

Kosher law ruled constitutional

JTA

NEW YORK — New York state's kosher law, which regulates the labelling and marketing of kosher food, does not violate the U.S. Constitution's First Amendment, a federal appeals court ruled.

The three-judge panel of the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan ruled May 10 in a constitutional challenge to the New York State Kosher Law Protection Act of 2004. Previously, kosher was defined legally as "according to Orthodox Hebrew religious requirements." Several butchers challenged the law in a 1996 suit.

"The Kosher Act does not entangle the state with religion because it does not require the state to enforce laws based on religious doctrine or to inquire into the religious content or religious nature of the products sold," Judge Christopher Droney wrote, saying that the law simply requires kosher products to be labelled with the required information.

Commack Kosher, a deli and butcher shop on Long Island, brought the lawsuit, as well as the suit that led to the rewording of the law.

The new kosher law does not define what constitutes kosher, but requires producers, distributors and retailers of food sold as kosher in the state to submit information about their products, including the identity of the person or organization that certifies them, to the state Department of Agriculture and Markets. The information is published in an online directory.

1,000 hold protest in Tel Aviv

The protest in Spain, itself an echo of the Arab Spring, was the first of many such protest movements in the West, including the Occupy Wall Street protest in New York and other cities in the English-speaking world and the Rothschild Boulevard cost-of-living "tent" protest in Tel Aviv and in other Israeli cities.

Last summer, a social justice protest movement swept Israel, with tent encampments sprouting up in cities throughout the country and weekly demonstrations that grew to include hundreds of thousands of people.

Earlier last week, around 1,000 people held a protest in Tel Aviv against the unity deal that was reached between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Kadima leader Shaul Mofaz, who decided to bring his Kadima party and its 28 seats into the ruling coalition.

Palestinian prisoners' hunger strike may be ending

JTA

JERUSALEM — It's unclear whether a deal to end the hunger strike of at least 1,400 Palestinian prisoners is near completion.

Unnamed Palestinian officials told Reuters Monday that Egypt had finished brokering a deal that would bring the hunger strike to an end. Rumours about the deal had been circulating over the weekend.

The prisoners and Israeli officials must now hammer out some specific details, according to Reuters.

But Israeli sources reportedly told Ynet Monday that no agreement had been reached.

Some 1,400 Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails are on an open-ended hunger strike launched more than three weeks ago. They are calling for an end to solitary confinement and isolation; permitting families of prisoners from the Gaza Strip to visit their loved ones; and allowing prisoners to have newspapers, learning materials and specific television channels. The strike is also protesting administrative detention. A prisoner can be held in administrative detention without charges being brought, for up to four months. The detention can also be renewed.

Two of the hunger strikers – Bilal Diab, 27, of Jenin, and Thaer Halahla, 33, of Hebron, who are both members of the Islamic Jihad terrorist organization – have been on a hunger strike for more than 70 days, placing their lives in danger.

Hamas and Islamic Jihad have threatened consequences if any of the hunger strikers die.

Israel demands Iran halt enrichment

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told European Union foreign policy chief Catherine Ashton that Iran must agree to halt all uranium enrichment in upcoming talks. Ashton was in Jerusalem to brief Netanyahu in the run-up to the second round of nuclear talks with Iran scheduled for May 23 in Baghdad. Netanyahu also accused Iran of "playing for time." Netanyahu invited Defense Minister Ehud Barak, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman and new coalition member Kadima head Shaul Mofaz to join the meeting with Ashton. Mofaz has spoken out in the past against a unilateral Israeli strike on Iranian nuclear facilities.

Poll: Netanyahu gains strength

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's political position has received a significant boost thanks to his coalition agreement with Kadima leader Shaul Mofaz, according to an opinion poll conducted last week by New Wave Research for the daily Israel Hayom. Some 39.8 percent of Israelis said they supported the newly formed unity government, which was brokered early last Tuesday morning. Some 31.9 percent said they opposed the pact. A further 28.4 percent said they were undecided.

Record number of tourists

The number of tourists entering Israel last month set a record. Some 354,000 visitors arrived in Israel in April, 19 percent more than in April 2011 and 12 percent more than in April 2010, during Israel's record year for tourism, according to Israel's Tourism Ministry. In addition, more than 1 million visitors arrived in Israel between January and April of this year, 4 percent more than the previous record.

Companies provide lessons in interior design

When it comes to interior design, each generation brings new trends and changes, believing theirs to be modern, contemporary and nothing like the way their parents decorated.

Brian Murphy, a Toronto designer of interiors and exteriors (brianmurphydesign.ca), recalls a time when everyone painted their homes beige. "They topped it off with white until their houses looked like a snowy day in winter," he jokes.

That was just a decade ago, and he's relieved to see more colour today, particularly the strong, bold, organic and earthy tones that are predominating in home interiors. "When people do accent they go for primary colours, like dark blue, dark purple, red and fuschia – it looks great, fresh, exciting and it feels fun," he says.

Those white houses used to feature big, poofy floral couches that have since been replaced with sleek, square-armed, much lower couches with rectilinear shapes. "They're popular, but it's hard to get out of them, particularly if you're over 40," says Murphy. The rectilinear shapes are accented with curvilinear coffee tables or dinner tables, often organic-looking items.

It's because people have become very interested in all things organic, he explains.

"We're seeing unfinished rock as a bathroom or floor surface, large pieces of wood serving as coffee tables or sideboard servers and benches made of old planks for barns," he says. "It makes people feel good, as if they're connected to time and space."

Home interiors are all about open-plan spaces today, he adds. "One of my clients had a big barn in Richmond Hill, but wanted all the walls on the main floor torn down. The kitchen, living and dining room are all one room now."

If the inside is about openness, the outdoors has become an extension of the interior and the trend today is for outside rooms. "Some of them feature a fireplace, couches, chairs, lighting, ceiling fans and even water sprays for the hot days," says Murphy. "The outdoor rooms have divides and barriers that create a real sense of being in another room rather than in your own yard."

Regardless of whether you're decorating your home's interior or your "outside room," you're going to need furniture and accessories, and that's where Design Source Furniture comes into the picture.

The family-operated company began in 1985 as an upholstered goods manufacturer, but expanded to include high-end accessories, chandeliers, coffee tables and lamps.

These are displayed in a 4,000-square-foot showroom geared specifically toward buyers who "want something special, unique and different – not made in China," says co-owner Tommy Klein. "This is a first-rate operation featuring top-quality products," he adds. "Typically, designers bring their clients into our showroom to see products imported from all over the world."

Most of those clients are Jewish, he adds, and new clients are welcome regardless of whether they bring their designers in tow, or make an appointment for a solo visit.

"We're having a pre-inventory sale," he adds. "Make an appointment to come in so we can show you what we have. We are the best-kept secret in Toronto. For more information, call 416-663-0366 or visit our website, www.designsourcefurniture.ca."

Nazi Germany held out despite a succession of defeats

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

World War II in Europe officially ended when Germany surrendered to the Allies on May 7, 1945. But in the view of Allied commanders, the war should really have drawn to a close in 1944, when the Third Reich was in full retreat.

Against all odds and in the face of defeat, Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime held out, thereby prolonging the war by about 10 months and condemning millions of civilians, particularly Jews, to needless suffering.

In The End: The Defiance and Destruction of Hitler's Germany, 1944-1945 (Penguin Press), the distinguished British historian Ian Kershaw explains in voluminous detail why Germany continued to fight until the bitter end.

"The fact that the regime did hold out and that the war ended only when Germany was militarily battered into submission, its economy destroyed, its cities in ruins, the country occupied by foreign powers – is historically an extreme rarity," Kershaw writes.

As he points out, wars in the modern era have usually ended when the ruling elites of a nation have sued for peace and reached an agreement with the victor. Indeed, this was the case in World War I. But in World War II, the pattern was completely shattered.

By the dictates of logic, Germany should have surrendered in 1944.

The D-Day landings at Normandy had taken place, setting the stage for Allied advances into Germany. Round-the-clock Allied bombing raids of German cities were taking a terrible toll. On the eastern front, the Red Army had smashed through Wehrmacht defences. In the Ardennes, Germany's last major offensive fizzled.

And yet Germany fought on, the great majority of Germans still unhesitatingly loyal in their support for the doomed war effort. In Kershaw's view, Germany's determination to carry on, come what may, was partly rooted in Hitler's refusal to contemplate capitulation. When he finally realized that victory was unattainable, he committed suicide rather than surrendering.

Hitler convinced his followers that defeat would bring about the utter destruction of the German people, and that Bolshevism, Germany's arch enemy, was a product of a Jewish conspiracy.

Reiterating this claim, Hitler's closest aide, Martin Bormann, declared, "A victory for Bolshevism... would mean not only the extermination of our race, but also the destruction of everything that its culture and civilization has created."

Brainwashed by these theories, ordinary Germans remained generally loyal to Hitler. As a result, support for the regime was widespread, not just among Nazi diehards, Kershaw notes.

The association of Hitler with patriotic support for the country remained strong, especially after the failed assassination attempt on his life in July 1944.

"Effusive outpourings of loyalty and support for the Fuehrer were immediately registered in all quarters, along with furious outrage at the 'tiny clique' of 'criminal' officers (as Hitler labelled them) who had perpetrated such a vile deed. It would, of course, have been near suicidal to voice regrets in public that Hitler had survived, though certainly that was the private feeling of a good many people."

A lasting consequence of the abortive assassination plot was the elimination of high-ranking officers in the armed forces who might have been agents of regime change, Kershaw observes. Conversely, with the general staff having been purged of so-called traitors, the military leadership expressed total obedience to Hitler.

Allied bombing raids devastated such German cities as Nuremberg, yet Germany fought on till the bitter end.

One of Hitler's firmest backers was Grand Admiral Karl Donitz. Although he cultivated the image of a purely professional officer, he was in actuality a real hardliner, never wavering from his appraisal of Hitler as a man of "extreme chivalry and kindness."

Albert Speer, the minister of armaments, was also instrumental in Germany's decision to prosecute the war at all costs. "Without my work, the war would perhaps have been lost in 1942-43," he claimed. "He was surely right," Kershaw says. "His achievements constitute an important element in the answer to the question of how Germany held out so long."

There is another factor to consider.

With signs of disintegration within the civilian population and among foot soldiers appearing in the winter of 1945, the regime stepped up repression at home. Germans were now increasingly subjected to what Kershaw describes as "wild reprisals for perceived defeatism."

But the worst of the terror was reserved for the regime's designated enemies: Jews, foreign workers, prisoners of war and concentration camp internees.

Jews, in particular, bore the brunt of the persecution. Death marches, coming on the heels of the Final Solution, which reached a peak of intensity from 1942 to 1944, claimed the lives of yet more Jews.

Kershaw says the majority of Germans appear to have been unconcerned by the fate of Jews, perhaps because relatively few people in Germany had first-hand, detailed knowledge of the Holocaust.

"For most, it was a case of 'out of sight, out of mind,' apart from the nagging worry that the ill-deeds perpetrated by German overlords might well come back to haunt then in defeat and occupation."

Germany paid an onerous price for extending the war to such absurd lengths. Out of 18.2 million servicemen who served in the Wehrmacht, Luftwaffe, navy and Waffen-SS, 5.3 million were killed.

"Of these, 2.7 million died down to the end of July 1944," he writes, adding that a further 2.6 million were killed in the last 10 months of the war.

By the very end, 300,000 to 400,000 servicemen were dying each month.

The casualty figures stagger the imagination, yet Allied opinion polls taken in the immediate aftermath of the war revealed that about 50 per cent of Germans still thought National Socialism had been in essence a good idea that had been badly implemented.

Another Allied survey, taken in October 1945, found that 20 per cent of Germans basically agreed with Hitler's Jewish policy. A further 19 per cent were also in agreement but thought Hitler had gone too far.

In conclusion, Kershaw points out that Germany persevered because "the structures and mentalities" of Hitler's regime lasted until he shot himself in his Berlin bunker on April 30, 1945.

"The dominant elites, divided as they were, possessed neither the collective will nor the mechanisms of power to prevent Hitler taking Germany to total destruction."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

Sheridan College grad lands role in Rent

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

In a way, budding actor Karina Bershteyn has Harry Potter to thank for her career choice.

"It's funny actually – the moment I realized I wanted to pursue a career in the entertainment industry was when the first Harry Potter film came out," she said. "I just remember seeing these other 11- and 12-year-olds up on the big screen and thinking, 'I could do that,'" she said.

Now 21, Bershteyn is among the next crop of theatre stars who will be performing in Theatre Sheridan's production of Rent, at the Panasonic Theatre in Toronto from May 16 to June 3.

Set in New York's East Village, Jonathan Larson's Rent is a modern take on the Puccini opera La Boheme. It tells the story of a group of friends and artists who are learning to survive, falling in love, finding their voices and living for today. An inspiring award-winning musical, Rent tackles themes of addiction, poverty, AIDS and relationships.

"This show is one that really speaks to me, because I feel as though the story is universal to people of all ages and all walks of life," Bershteyn said.

"I'm excited to be able to share this story once again. This is a brilliant opportunity being given to us graduates, as we are entering the business. It's like our big hello to the industry."

Part of the graduating class of Sheridan College's music theatre program, Bershteyn has a passion for performance that began at a young age. She started taking dance classes at eight years old and attended theatre camp every summer.

Having a good understanding of her Jewish heritage influences how Bershteyn approaches certain works. "If I am doing a monologue from a play that deals with Jewish history or themes, it makes my ability to connect to the piece that much easier because my personal history can relate to the history of the character," she said.

Karina Bershteyn

In Rent, Bershteyn plays Mrs. Cohen, the lead character's mother. As well, she has several ensemble parts and is a featured dancer.

"When creating the character, director Lezlie Wade told me she wanted Mrs. Cohen to be a typically overprotective, overcaring Jewish mother from New York," Bershteyn said.

"I didn't need to use my imagination very much, because I grew up with a mother exactly like Mrs. Cohen, except for her being from Russia instead of New York. There are some things about growing up Jewish that really only those of us who grew up that way would be able to know what that fully entails."

While involved in the production, Bershteyn has had the opportunity to work alongside some of Canada's top theatre professionals.

"Lezlie Wade, [musical director] Bob Foster and [choreographer] Marc Kimelman have been absolute inspirations. They instil their knowledge and passion into everything they do, and it makes the rest of us want to give just as much to this production."

She said one of the nice things about working with professionals of such high calibre is that they are efficient. "They won't let us get away with anything less than excellence, which is fantastic because it pushes us to be the best we can possibly be."

While still a new talent, Bershteyn has already been cast in a number of productions. Last summer, she played Bebe in A Chorus Line (Rose Theatre) and Salome in Robin Hood (GADZ Productions, Theatre Aquarius).

Before that, she reprised the role of Janet in The Rocky Horror Show at Port Mansion Dinner Theatre in St. Catharines, Ont., for two years in a row. Both years she was recognized for her performance at the Niagara Music Awards. This season, she played Linda in Blood Brothers and Diane in the musical Come From Away, developed by the Canadian Music Theatre Project, an incubator for the development of new musical theatre.

Bershteyn said she's most proud of what she accomplished playing Linda in Blood Brothers. "It was a challenging role in that it demanded a lot both physically and emotionally. Though there are many funny moments, the show is overall very dark and the characters go through a lot of hardships, so it was great to see how far I could push myself working with extreme circumstances."

Bershteyn said her family members are now very supportive of her theatrical ambition, but at first questioned her career choice. "My parents and my grandparents immigrated to Canada from Russia, so you can imagine their upbringings were very different from mine. After I booked my first paying performance job when I was 14, my parents slowly became less and less skeptical. They could see that I really was serious about this, and that it wasn't just a phase."

After Rent closes, Bershteyn said she'll be auditioning for other shows. "It's all very much so up in the air, but to me that just means a whole world of opportunity awaits."

Bershteyn said she would like to continue performing in professional theatre in Canada and internationally. She also plans to work her way into film and television.

"I feel that with the training I have had, and the training I will continue to do, I am equipped with enough of a variety of skills that I can delve into many different sides of the industry," she said.

"Most of all though, I just hope to be able to make my living performing because it is what I love most, regardless of what form it is in. That, to me, is the greatest success I hope to achieve."

Bershteyn advises aspiring threatre professionals to "train, train, train. And after that, train some more. Always be open to learning more, because as an artist, the learning is never over. And with that, never compromise who you are or your integrity. As long as you are respectful to those around you, people will respect you for choosing to be who you are, instead of trying to be who you think people want you to be."

Yuk Yuks bringing laughs to Israel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canadian comedy club chain Yuk Yuks is sending a delegation of six comedians to Israel next month to spread some Canuck cheer and learn what makes Israelis laugh.

While there, the comics will be shadowed by a CBC film crew, led by Toronto director Igal Hecht, for a documentary to be released later this year.

In a recent interview with The CJN, Yuk Yuks president and CEO, Mark Breslin, said he'll be making his first visit to the Holy Land along with the standup comedians – three Jewish, three not – and is looking forward to further connecting with his Jewish roots.

The comedians are Rebbecca Kohler, Aaron Berg, Sam Easton, Jean Paul, Nikki Payne and Michael Khardas. The latter is an Israeli Canadian.

In a country that's experienced its fair share of sorrow and hardship, a comedy trip to Israel seems like a potentially great balm for a perpetually stressed Israeli populace. But Breslin expects that the country will also have a significant impact on his own retinue.

While the touring comics hope to "kill" audiences in Israel, the country and its diverse cultures will likely affect the travelling Canadian comedians and their material, Breslin said.

The weeklong comedy trip runs from May 30 to June 7.

They'll be doing standup gigs in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Herzliya, as well as meeting with a number of Israeli comedians to share their experiences and engage in a comedic cultural exchange.

Breslin said the idea for the trip stemmed from his anger at the anti-Israel events that unfolded at the 2010 Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF). What he witnessed from the boycott, divestment and sanctions advocates at the time – various filmmakers and actors vocally opposed TIFF's spotlight on Tel Aviv films at the time – sent him into a fury.

"There were some people in the arts who protested and thought it was wrong" to spotlight Israel, he said. "So I thought, what if I did an Israeli comedy festival in Toronto. Would they picket me or was comedy not important enough?"

While that question wasn't answered, the Israeli consulate in Toronto helped plant the seeds of this upcoming trip.

"I approached the Israeli government in Toronto and asked about what kind of access there might be to English-speaking comics in Israel" with the goal of bringing them to Canada, Breslin said.

He found out that there was indeed an English comedy circuit in Israel that might send some comedians to Canada. But the consulate proposed another idea: sending a group of Canadian comedians to Israel.

Breslin said before that talk, he'd never considered that option.

"Of the seven of us going, only one has ever been to Israel, Michael, who's one of our fledgling comics," he said.

The trip is also part of a plan to capitalize on the burgeoning international appetite for English-speaking comedians, Breslin said.

"Did you know there's a comic circuit in Scandinavia for English-speaking comics?" he asked rhetorically. "And as far as I know, no one has yet taken a look at Israel as a place where people have taken a new interest in standup comedy, which they obviously have. Everyone [in Israel] speaks English, pretty much."

He cited comedy clubs springing up in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and other towns in Israel.

Breslin said it's not out of the question that a Yuk Yuks franchise could work in Israel, specifically in Tel Aviv, and it's something he'll look into while there.

"If I found someone who could run it, a franchisee, it's not impossible," he said.

On a personal note, this being his first trip to Israel, he said now that he's turned 60, it's time to make the journey.

"In my assimilated, arty circle, it's not unusual" to have not visited Israel, he said, adding: "I married a German. Does it get more assimilated than that?"

FILM FESTIVAL TO INCLUDE DOC ON MUSIC IMPRESARIO SAUL HOLIFF

The North by Northeast (NXNE) Film Festival is scheduled to screen more than 40 movies in June, including several with some connection to the Canadian Jewish community.

One of the highlights of the festival is the Canadian première of My Father and the Man in Black, a feature-length documentary focusing on Johnny Cash's talented but troubled manager, the late impresario Saul Holiff, formerly of London, Ont.

Written and directed by Saul's son, Jonathan Holiff, the film includes previously unreleased footage that weaves a fascinating yet tragic story: Holiff, estranged from his father for 20 years, discovered a storage locker just six months after Saul's death in 2005. Inside were hundreds of handwritten letters between Saul, Cash and Cash's wife, June Carter, taped conversations with Cash and an audio diary reaching back to 1965.

NXNE is also screening I Met the Walrus, an animated film directed by Josh Raskin and produced by Jerry Levitan of Toronto. Nominated for an Oscar in 2008, I Met the Walrus features a 14-year-old Levitan and his encounter with music legend John Lennon. It is being screened alongside its companion piece, My Hometown, an animated short produced and directed by Levitan and Terry Tompkins, and narrated by Yoko Ono.

The festival is also running KMS: Jewish Negroes, director Moran Ifergan's film about a year in the lives of three Ethiopian Jewish friends in the band KMS in Israel. NXNE screenings take place at the NFB Mediatheque, Royal Cinema and Toronto Underground Cinema, June 11 to 17. www.nxne.com

History of comedy is laden with Jewish influence

Breslin said his family has been in Canada since the 1880s, so their connection to Europe and the Middle East was always distant.

Not having led a "traditional" Jewish life, he said during the course of his career he hasn't had much room to express his Jewishness.

"I've always looked for ways to do this. I don't have a political attachment to Israel. I don't belong to a shul. My community is less Jewish and more multicultural. But this trip may be one of the ways I can connect with the Jewish strand in my life. I couldn't [connect] in a conventional way because I don't do anything in a conventional way," he joked.

Mark Breslin

"But in the end, I enjoy being a Jew. I don't think enough people say that," he said.

Bringing the conversation back to comedy, Breslin noted that the history of the craft is laden with Jewish influence but the old days of Jewish comedians dominating the landscape of North American comedy – the Borsht Belt circuit being one example – are over. But there is a new flavour of Jewish comedy in the world, and it's emerging from the Holy Land.

"The history of comedy as we know it is very much the history of Jewish comedy. And the idea that there may be a place in the world now, Israel, that is going to continue on in creating a new tradition of Jewish comedy, really excites me and interests me," he said.

It will also be an apolitical trip, Breslin said, noting he ensured that all the comedians had "good feelings" about Israel before embarking on the tour.

His goal for the trip to expose people to how "great a country Israel is."

"It's a progressive country. The people going on this trip are not religious people, to put it mildly. The Israel we're interested in is the one that is a beacon of western thought and democracy in the Middle East," Breslin said.

He added: "As artists, a lot of the time we identify with the outsiders and [one area] where we note this is happening is in Tel Aviv's huge gay community. Also, there's an explosion of Israeli filmmaking happening. The political debate on Israel has been going of for so long… there's a lot of other stuff in Israel that should be seen."

Lastly, Breslin said he hasn't let go of the idea of bringing Israeli comics to Canada as part of a cross-cultural initiative.

Judo coach scouting Maccabiah-calibre athletes

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The last time Maccabi Canada sent a judo team to the Maccabiah Games, it consisted of only two fighters.

Countries like Israel, the United States, Argentina and Russia sent dozens.

Now, one of those two Canadian judokas has been put in charge of Maccabi Canada's judo entry for the 2013 Games, and he's aiming to grow the team.

Erez Cohen, who hails originally from Bnei Brak, Israel, believes there are enough good Canadian athletes to round out a competitive team.

One of them, expected to be a medal contender, is Roman Abramowicz, a 24-year-old immigrant from Kirgistan, who is not to be confused with the Russian billionaire of the same name.

A handful of others may be persuaded to try out for the team, enough to compete in each weight category, or about 10 in all, Cohen said.

Most, like he and Abramowicz, were either born abroad or are the children of immigrants. "It's hard to find a Canadian born to Canadian parents who will do judo," he said.

Still, he believes, "there are enough Jewish athletes in Canada. We can build a team."

Cohen's assignment at first blush is a lot more challenging that that faced by judo GMs in other countries. In some countries, like the United States, Russia, Argentina and Israel, judo is a very popular sport. Top judokas there are treated with the same kind of reverence we'd associate with hockey stars here.

One of Israel's top athletes, and perhaps its most popular, is Ariel Zeevi, who recently won the European championship in the 100-kilogram class. He's won the title five times since 2000, to go along with his 2004 Olympic bronze medal. Hundreds if not thousands of Israelis flock to European venues to see him compete, Cohen said.

Ironically, both he and Zeevi hail from the same small community of Bnei Brak, known more for its haredi demography than for athletic excellence. They also trained at the same club. "We're kind of the black sheep of the city," Cohen quipped.

Cohen competed for Israel in international events and twice represented the country at the Maccabiah Games before moving to Canada.

Cohen takes over the reins of the judo team from longstanding team captain Mark Berger. Berger, originally from Russia, is an Olympic bronze medallist, competed for Canada at Maccabiah Games and was the team's flag-bearer on one occasion.

Cohen expects to get the word out about next summer's Maccabiah at future competitions and through word-of-mouth with judo coaches around the country.

He's already been approached by non-Jewish coaches suggesting potential Maccabiah competitors.

"It's a small community," he said. "Judokas hang out at all the tournaments. Jewish people just find each other."

The Ontario Open is set for May 19 and 20 in west Toronto, and Cohen will be on hand to scout potential athletes and make his pitch.

For anybody willing to listen, he'll tell them the Maccabiah Games "is going to be one of the best experiences they'll ever have in their lives. I will tell them, it's one of the highlights of any event I have ever been in." It brings together people from around the world "who share a love of Israel and sports. It's something you can't describe."

Soccer-thon raises funds for kids with disabilities

Compiled by CJN Staff

Beit Issie Shapiro's (BISYP) second annual Soccer-thon, dubbed "Kicking for Kids," raised $8,300 for children in Israel suffering disabilities. Last year, the organization raised $1,800.

Some 100 soccer players ranging in age from 20 to 50 took part in the event at the Astra SportsPlex on Rutherford Road in Vaughan, Ont.

Divided into 10 teams, they played three-on-three soccer games in a round-robin format.

Children cheered on the adults, and the sounds of "vuvuzelas" (plastic horns) added to the festive atmosphere. Children enjoyed a kids zone before the games began.

Team Min2 raised the most money for the charity, while Brian Singer was acknowledged for raising the most money through sponsorship.

All proceeds from the Soccer-thon will go to support Beit Issie Shapiro in Israel, a leading innovator of new therapies for children and adults with disabilities. Over the past 30 years, the organization has grown from serving 16 children to assisting some 30,000 people every year.

Beit Issie Shapiro also helps train thousands of therapists in Israel and conducts research. The organization has been a leader in promoting the inclusion of people with disabilities into society and advocating for better legal provisions for people with disabilities.

Gilad Epstein and BISYP's young professionals group organized the event.

Beit Issie Shapiro was named Israel's most effective non-profit organization in 2011 by Midot, a group that monitors the effectiveness of Israel's charitable sector.

Provocative Israeli photographer's exhibit running in Toronto

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Adi Nes' art is deliberate, methodical and designed to ensnare viewers with its provocative subject matter: namely, subtle, homoerotic images of Israeli soldiers and downtrodden men, often posed in bleak landscapes.

Born in Kiryat Gat to Iranian and Kurdish immigrant parents, he told The CJN his photographs are partially autobiographical in that they are designed to represent the "periphery" of Israeli society – people from villages and towns such as Kiryat Gat that were initially founded by Sephardi immigrants, often low-income families from North Africa.

Though the demographics and economic situation of his hometown have changed since his childhood, Ness said the tensions and prejudice he and his cohort experienced growing up in Israel as immigrants and dark-skinned Jews continue to haunt his work.

While Ashkenazim and Sephardim today in Israel have since "gotten over it," Nes said his pictures are part of his experience growing up and then coming out as a gay man in Israel.

"But the past always exists in the present. And in the past there was a big issue between Sephardim and Ashkenazim," he said. "And many people are still not over it. I choose to deal with these issues, because Sephardim used to be labelled as minorities, which caused them to question their identity" in white Israel.

His first Toronto exhibition is being presented by the Koffler Centre for the Arts, on display off-site at the Olga Korper Gallery, 17 Morrow Ave.

The exhibition includes Nes' most prominent photographs from Soldiers (1994-2000), Boys (2000) and Biblical Stories (2003-2006) series, including the iconic Untitled (The Last Supper) (1999).

It runs until June 2.

Nes said he toured Montreal some years ago and was enjoying his stay in Toronto last week.

"Montreal is Europe and Toronto is the New York City" of Canada, he offered.

Speaking to The CJN at the exhibit last week, Nes said the theme of his work focuses on issues of identity.

"I'm a multi-faceted person, as we all are. My early work was more focused on homoeroticism, because I was still in the process of coming out," he said. "There were issues of masculinity and Israeliness."

Now, however, his work continues to evolve, and this week Nes was scheduled to release his first new project since 2007. This one is titled The Village and will feature a set of photographs that attempts to "connect to the new Israeli society."

Nes said he's been contemplating issues that Israel needs to grapple with moving forward as a country.

"What is Israel today? Is it still based on the Zionist dream? If not, then what? We must ask who we are and who we want to be," he said. "We're getting to a place where [Israel] must ask itself more about its identity and less about its politics. Peace starts from the inside. When we recognize our defects… as with anyone, not every aspect of a person is good."

The new exhibit launched in Tel Aviv on May 17, and Nes said he hopes to tour it in Canada sometime down the road.

"The Village is a metaphor for Israel as a small place built after a tragedy. It's a beautiful place, but with tension and tragedy lurking behind the scenes," Nes said by way of describing his new work.

He turned to photography as a career shortly after his military service, where he was an air-traffic controller. He needed an avenue to express his artistic side.

After enrolling at the Academy of Art and Design in Jerusalem, he took numerous courses in all aspects of drawing, including graphic and industrial design, photography and painting.

"But since I came from a middle-class family, I needed to study something in order to make a living," Nes said. "I never thought about photography, but by accident I enrolled in a photography program and I was surprised when I was invited to interview for it, and even more surprised when they accepted me."

Young artist celebrates early successes

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

It takes a lot of work to become an artist.

"People just think you'll paint something and then sell it, but it's so much more complex," says Sam Shuter.

That's what the 25-year-old artist, also known as Sammo, found out when she quit her job in film production to begin a new career as an artist. Throughout her five years actively working in the film industry, painting was always her release, she says.

Originally from Montreal, she moved to Toronto as a teenager. She spends her days in the city building her new art career, which largely involves promoting her paintings to build a fan base.

Her first series is called "Introduction," and it aims to introduce her to the world as an artist. These paintings use vibrant colours to depict men wearing suits –always portrayed from the neck down.

"I just like the idea that it's the everyman," she says, explaining why she refuses to put faces on the men. She also doesn't title her paintings for the same reason.

"Unless I feel like there's something that comes naturally, I'm not going to force-title it. It leaves it open for more interpretation."

Suits have always been the focus of her art, going as far back as her childhood. Shuter recalls sitting in her Grade 2 class, drawing doodles of men in suits.

Sam Shuter

"My teacher took my doodles and held them up to the front of the class," she says. "I was mortified."

Despite her embarrassment, she says to this day, she has kept track of the doodles.

She attributes her fascination with the subject to the straight lines that make up a suit.

"It's a weird thing about control," she says. "It's just something I always loved so I always sketched it."

Despite the consistent subject, Shuter says each painting is unique. Some are more playful, while others are serious.

"I have some that are basic and straightforward, and there's another I'm working on that looks like he's jumping into the air," she says.

Although she only recently made art her full-time job, she's made promising strides already. Her work will soon be featured in two retail stores in Toronto – "these awesome, upscale, bespoke tailor shops in the downtown core" – and she's working out the details for a contract to display her art across the pond at a gallery in London. Another gallery, in Miami, will be showcasing her work in the fall.

Social media is at the heart of her early success, she says. The British gallery discovered her through Twitter, a medium she has found incredibly time-consuming, yet invaluable for gathering fans and networking with other artists.

Although her Jewish roots aren't directly shown in her art, she's been very inspired by her Jewish grandparents.

Her grandfather has always encouraged her to be as productive as possible – an attitude that's helped her find early success.

Her grandmother often paints as well, and inspires her creatively. Shuter says there have been times in her life when she wasn't painting regularly, but when she saw her grandmother painting, it reminded her that she needed to get back into the art.

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

Shuter describes the process of creating a painting as a little bit daunting. She says she gets excited when she starts, and then halfway through decides she hates the way it's turning out. She'll continue painting for hours, and then realize she loves the finished product.

It's not always easy to figure out when it's done. "I never know when to put the brush down," she says. "My sign is when I wrack my brain and there's nothing else I can possibly put down there."

Paintings can sometimes take months from start to finish, although she compares the process to writing a book.

"Let's say it takes someone four years to write a book," she says. "But how many actual days during those four years were they writing?"

Once, she kept a painting as a work-in-progress for two months because she couldn't decide what colours to use. Her colour choices can heavily change the energy of the picture.

"Sometimes, my selection feels more natural than others," she says. "I was hitting 'painter's block,' so I let that painting hang on the wall for a while and started another one."

For now, Shuter will continue her "Introduction" series, which currently includes nine paintings. She says she'll keep on adding to this collection until she feels she no longer has to introduce herself as an artist.

"I could see myself going to a hundred paintings," she says.

And when does an artist know that they've found success?

"When I get to the point where I can comfortably do this for a living, I'll feel successful on another level," she says, "but I already feel successful in taking something I love and being able to share it with people."

"טעים!" אני טורפת קרואסון אחר קריאסון, בעוד טלי נוברת בסלט שלה בהרחור. "שונאת חסה," היא מודיעה לבסוף. אני מזמינה מנת לחם עם המאה נוספת אני: אני מה זה נכנסת ללחץ כשאת מתחילה דיאטות.
טלי: זה הכל בגלל ג'ניפר. ולפני שאת מתפרצת עם הגיניך הקולנועים, לא. לא ג'ניפר אניסטון, ולא מעניין אותי אם היא תלך לחתונה של הבראנג'לינות.
אני: אז איזה ג'ניפר?
אנחנו שותקות לכמה רגעים.

Community: exasperating, yet soothing

Kehilla, community, is paramount.

What is it? We are born into or decide early on to form a relationship with a group of like-minded people who offer us safety and/or warmth, as well as resources, the ability for us to give, and basic and complex human interaction.

Community controls space. Our people are extraordinary at creating it, even in the concentration camps.

The macro-Jewish community is a place where we can access funds given by the collective to send our children to day school; garner a sense of security when terrorist attacks are perpetrated, and access broad programs that relate to our Jewish values.

Then there is the shul, synagogue or temple – a micro-community that offers us something more intense and regular, such as a place to go to actualize Halachah and learn Torah; a personal rabbi, who consoles us and celebrates with us during crisis or festivities; committees to join to make our mark; people we communicate with who give our sense of belonging borders.

(In truth, family is our first community, and likely the most important one. It's the environment where we learn how to choose our other micro and macro communities, or discover them.)

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Leonardo Da Vinci would invite street people to his home, feed them and give them drinks to imbibe so they would be even more animated, then sketch them. He believed that this population, when looked at closely, created the greatest option for characters on canvas – individualism par excellence.

When we look closely at our shul/synagogue/temple, we can see the same, the individuals and characters who make up are our community.

Who sits in front of us at shul? The family who gave us a sweet purple silk blanket for our son's brit. Who sits behind us? A newcomer, the lovely woman from Saskatoon. Who's the man on the bimah? He's the gabbai, the guy who seems to have been built with the shul – always there, with a booming voice – and who rarely calls me up for an aliyah. (Complaining and being marginalized is part of belonging).

Then there's the person the shul takes care of. He's the middle-aged man, likely diagnosed in his younger days as being cognitively impaired.

He's the one with two dozen families lined up to invite him on any given Shabbat or yom tov. We see him at every minyan saying something cute, compelling or annoying to mostly everyone. He has a unique relationship with more people than you or I could manage, because interaction is his modus operandi. It's his key to survival. In a most compelling way, the shul-man represents the main principle of community – being taken care of.

Like Da Vinci' visitors, the shul-man is usually animated and fun. His sense of humour trumps ours, because he sees life in a younger way. His giving comes through sound bites that make us chortle. But then there's his wise side. He stands up in front of olam and says, "God is in charge of all of us, and when mashiach comes, I will have family just like you." (A true quote.)

Judaism discourages the isolated lifestyle of the nazir. One of the severest punishments handed out by the beit din is ostracization from the community, or cherem. Kehilla is paramount.

If you don't belong, consider it. It can be exasperating but highly soothing in a life where our existential anguish can throb like a sore ligament.

South Sudan develops ties with Israel

Armin Rosen
JTA

JUBA, South Sudan — This city in the world's newest country is not your typical Arabic-speaking capital.

For one thing, most of the city's inhabitants are Christian. For another, the Israeli flag is ubiquitous here.

At the Juba souk in the city's downtown, you can buy lapel pins with the Israeli flag alongside its black, red and green South Sudanese counterpart.

"I love Israel," said Joseph Lago, who sells pens, chewing gum and phone cards at a small wooden stall decorated with Israeli and South Sudanese flags. "They are people of God."

South Sudan's fondness for Israel also extends to the diplomatic arena, where the two countries have been building strategic ties in a relationship that long preceded the founding of South Sudan last July.

"They see in us kind of a role model in how a small nation surrounded by enemies can survive and prosper, and they would like to imitate that," Haim Koren, the incoming Israeli ambassador to South Sudan, told JTA.

South Sudan was created last year when its residents voted to secede from Sudan, a country with a Muslim majority and without diplomatic ties to Israel. The government in Khartoum accepted the secession, but in recent weeks a long-simmering dispute over oil revenues and borders has brought the two Sudans to the brink of all-out war.

Asper Park Proposed

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz wants to make green space near the Canadian Human Rights Museum into a park honouring the late media mogul Israel Asper. Katz made the suggestion last week after an Alberta developer withdrew plans for a controversial $75-million water park and hotel complex on the site. City council had voted to delay contributing $7 million to the project, saying it needed more details. The new museum was the last major project championed by Asper before his death in 2003. Controversy has surrounded plans for it to include a gallery dedicated to the Holocaust, with critics saying no single human rights atrocity should be given special prominence in the museum.

Talmud Translated

AMMAN — A Middle East affairs think-tank in Jordan has published a translation of the Babylonian Talmud into Arabic. The Middle East Studies Center in Amman recently completed the 20-volume work. According to an Arabic advertisement for the Talmud, it took six years for more than 95 translators, researchers and language editors to complete what is being called the first-ever Arabic translation of the Babylonian Talmud. "This translation opens up a wide horizon for academic studies in understanding Jewish religious thought and in recognizing its various manifestations throughout history," the ad says. The National Library of Israel has acquired a copy.

Terror Suit Succeeds

WASHINGTON, D.C., — The family of a Florida teen killed in a Palestinian suicide bombing in Tel Aviv won a $323-million judgment in a U.S. court against Iran and Syria. A Washington, D.C., judge ruled May 14 that Iran and Syria were responsible for the attack by an Islamic Jihad terrorist that killed Daniel Wultz, 16, and 10 others in an April 2006 restaurant bombing. Damascus-based Islamic Jihad took responsibility for the attack. Wultz died 27 days after the bombing. The judgment came six years to the day after his death. The suit was brought on behalf of the family by the Shurat HaDin Israel Law Center under a special provision in U.S. law that lets U.S. citizens sue foreign governments for terrorist acts. It's the first time the centre has won a judgment against Syria, director Nitsana Darshan-Leitner said.

Historian Wrote of Jewish Resistance

Arno Lustiger

BERLIN — Arno Lustiger, a Holocaust survivor and historian who highlighted Jewish resistance against the Nazis, died May 15 in Frankfurt at age 88.

Lustiger's "greatest contribution" was in "rescuing from oblivion the story of Jewish resistance in the Shoah," Dieter Graumann, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said. Lustiger, a native of Bendzin, survived six Nazi camps, including Auschwitz and Buchenwald. His father and brother were murdered.

In April 1945, Lustiger escaped a death march and was rescued by U.S. soldiers. He and his mother and sisters ended up in a displaced persons camp in Frankfurt. His plans to go to America fell through, and he ended up staying in Frankfurt, where he helped build the postwar Jewish community, as well as a successful women's fashion business.

He sold the business in the 1980s to focus on academic work, for which he received international praise. From 2004 to 2006, he was a guest professor at the Fritz Bauer Institute, the Frankfurt-based study and documentation centre on the Holocaust. Among his contributions are works on Jewish heroism in World War II.

Lustiger for decades avoided talking about his own history, even with family. In 2007, he famously said Kaddish at the funeral in Paris of his cousin, French Cardinal Jean-Marie Lustiger, who had converted to Catholicism in Nazi-occupied France.

Jewish doctor talks about his German life

Bernd Wollschlaeger

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

One day a few years ago, Bernd Wollschlaeger got a call from his son's Hebrew school in South Florida. Could he explain, he was asked, what his son meant when he wrote a story about his grandfather, "the famous Nazi."

Actually, Wollschlaeger said, his son, Tal, was 100 per cent correct. His grandfather was a dedicated Nazi and a German tank commander in World War II. He'd won the prestigious Knight's Cross and was decorated by Adolf Hitler himself.

Unlike Tal's grandfather, however, Wollschlaeger rejected Nazism and found spiritual fulfilment and inner peace by converting to Judaism.

When the school rabbi heard the story, he suggested Wollschlaeger tell it more widely. Wollschlaeger agreed and began by addressing students in his son's school. From there, he went on to speak to Jewish groups and temple congregations. And then, "it steamrolled."

It all culminated in a book, A German Life, in which Wollschlaeger described the journey that took him from a Catholic upbringing in Bavaria to conversion, a move to Israel and then to Miami. People can change against all odds, Wollschlaeger believes, and last week, he was in Toronto to tell his story to supporters of the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center. He's also spoken about his experiences at the organization's Los Angeles headquarters.

In his early years, Wollschlaeger got along well with his father, who taught him to hunt and fish. During those outings, his father described his wartime service in the Wehrmacht (German army) and how he was personally decorated by Hitler, "whom he still admired."

"He saw himself as a knight in shining armour."

Things really began to change for Wollschlaeger when he was 14. It was 1972 and Munich was hosting the Olympic Games. His parents "froze in front of the television screen" when Israeli athletes paraded in to the opening ceremonies carrying the Star of David flag.

Then, a few days later, German newspapers screamed the headline, "Jews killed in Germany again." It was a reference to the murder of Israeli athletes by Palestinian terrorists and of the botched rescue attempt by German police.

When he asked his father what the headline meant, he was told, "It means nothing. In this house, we don't talk about them. It's over with them. We dealt with them."

Most Israelis want peace, but mistrust Palestinians

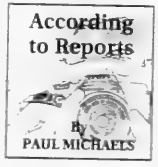
Earlier this year, in a Foreign Affairs article titled "Can the Center Hold? Understanding Israel's Pragmatic Majority," Yossi Klein Halevi examined the seeming contradiction in Israeli attitudes toward peace: "A majority of Israelis – around 70 per cent, according to a recent poll… support a two-state solution. Yet that same majority is deeply skeptical of Palestinian intentions."

This majority (sometimes called "the rational centre"), he explained, want to see an end to occupation and a genuine two-state solution so that Israel's future can be secure as both a Jewish and democratic state. Yet they're profoundly concerned that the Palestinian leadership, including both Fatah and Hamas, will never accept the legitimacy of Jewish sovereignty in present-day Israel.

Klein Halevi reminded readers that when Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas addressed the UN General Assembly last September, he condemned "63 years of Israeli occupation." This meant that in his view, all of Israel is "occupied," not just the West Bank (taken legitimately in a war of self-defence in 1967, let's not forget). Abbas' declaration sent chills through the Israeli public, as does the Palestinian leadership's consistent refusal to give up the principle of the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to Israel rather than to a future Palestinian state.

Klein Halevi focused on the core of Israel's predicament: "[A]lthough centrists understand how damaging to both sides the occupation has become, they view ending it before the Palestinians accept Israel as a Jewish state as an even greater existential threat… in January 2011, nearly 70 per cent of Israelis polled moderately or strongly accepted the claim that even if a peace agreement were signed, the Palestinians would continue their struggle against Israel."

The Peace Index for April, released last week, shows that this attitude is unchanged. While 71 per cent of the Israeli public favours holding peace negotiations, 67 per cent don't believe that such talks will lead to peace in the coming years. Some 58 per cent said they don't think there's a real chance to resolve the conflict in accordance with the "two states for two peoples" formula within the next 10 years.



Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's call for the Palestinians to endorse the central idea of "two states for two peoples" captures the longing of the dominant Israeli centre, and yet his appeal has been repeatedly dismissed by Abbas. Nonetheless, Netanyahu is almost invariably described in the western media as a "hardliner" while Abbas is portrayed as a "moderate" and a "peacenik."

It's true that Netanyahu had been constrained by factions on his right flank, up until making a surprise announcement on May 8 that he had entered into an agreement with the Kadima party to create a broad "national unity" government. But this misses a more important point. Until Abbas and the Palestinians address the "rational centre" of Israel and provide assurance of their commitment to put an end to the conflict once and for all, there can be no serious progress on the peace front.

Were one to read last week's influential Economist, featuring an editorial on the peace process following the Israeli government shakeup, one would know nothing of Israel's moderate middle – or even basic Palestinian responsibilities. Instead, one would read the standard storyline that if only Netanyahu could become more flexible (now that he has Kadima leader Shaul Mofaz by his side), peace would be dispensed by Abbas, whose "authority [as] the most peace-minded of Palestinian leaders is ebbing."

The Economist remains skeptical about Netanyahu while simply assuming, as fact, that the Palestinians want full peace: "It is possible, even probable, that Mr. Netanyahu will choose to go on ignoring Palestinian pleas and the ideas of Mr. Mofaz, whose plan [to declare a Palestinian state on 60 per cent of the West bank] is anyway far from fully baked."

It's sad but true that the Economist's failure to understand the crux of the peace impasse is symptomatic of a widespread attitude – with few exceptions – in western media circles in general.

QUAIA to attend Pride Parade

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A controversial local anti-Israel, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered (LGBT) group has announced that it plans to participate in the annual Toronto Pride Parade again this summer after a one-year absence.

Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QUAIA) told the Toronto Star it wants to rejoin the parade after skipping last year's event so that it would not put city funding at risk.

In March 2011, Mayor Rob Ford told The CJN that "taxpayer dollars should not go toward funding hate speech," and he and some of his council allies threatened to withhold funding to the festival if QuAIA took part.

City council is scheduled to vote next month on a recommendation that it allocate $123,807 to this year's Pride festival, being held June 22 to July 1.

Pride Toronto will compile and publish a list of applicants next month. As per new vetting mechanisms put in place by Pride last year – as a result of controversy surrounding QuAIA's presence in prior years – the public can register complaints about applicants on the list to Pride's dispute resolution panel.

The panel comprises legal experts who are responsible for evaluating complaints and deciding on whether to allow applicants to take part in festival events.

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu Toronto, the city's main Jewish LGBT organization, told The CJN it's too early to determine whether her group would file a complaint if QuAIA does apply to participate this year.

However, she said QuAIA is "marginalized" and "out of step" with Torontonians.

"Toronto wants nothing to do with [QuAIA's] anti-Israel, inflammatory venom," Apple said. "We're interested in a welcoming and inclusive Pride. But we'll take this as it comes. It's too soon to decide what we'll do about [QuAIA] at this point, but if we have to, we'll put plans in place to file a complaint."

Young professionals join March of the Living

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Three young Temple Sinai members were sponsored to participate in a March of the Living trip in hopes they would return to share their experiences with friends and family and keep the memory of the Holocaust alive.

The Temple Sinai Annual March of the Living Fund, which was established this year by congregants Lawrence and Beverley Fein in memory of Seymore Obront, will send three young Temple Sinai members on the March of the Living tour each year.

This initiative is meant to honour Obront, a close friend of the Feins who died in 2009, as well as promote Holocaust education.

The March of the Living is a two-week trip that begins in Poland, touring preserved concentration camps and other World War II sites, and concludes in Israel where thousands of March participants mark Yom Hazikaron and celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Andrew Chris, Leah Krangle and Joshua Rosenblum were chosen to represent the first young adult delegation on the trip that ran from April 15 to 31. They joined a group of 45 other young delegates from Toronto and New York between the ages of 22 and 34.

Chris, a 32-year-old family lawyer, said nothing could have prepared him for what he saw and heard.

From left, Leah Krangle, Joshua Rosenblum, and Andrew Chris stand in what was once the Warsaw ghetto during a March of the Living tour last month.

"For me, seeing a preserved concentration camp first-hand isn't something you could really understand until you're actually there," Chris said, adding that delving deeper into the history of the Holocaust influenced his views on Israel.

"I've been to Israel previously on two occasions, but going to Israel in this way, following a week of education about the Holocaust, it was a different way to experience Israel and I gained a different appreciation. I have a better understanding of why a Jewish state is so critical to the survival of the Jewish people. If Israel had existed in the late 1930s, a major tragedy may have been averted."

Leah Krangle, 24, a marketing manager for a mystery shopping company, said one of the most meaningful aspects of the tour was having the privilege of taking the tour with Pinchas Gutter, a Holocaust survivor.

"Walking through Auschwitz-Birkenau and Treblinka and hearing real people's accounts of what happened... that was really impactful for me," Krangle said.

Polish-born Gutter and his family spent three years in the Warsaw Ghetto before he and his family were deported to Majdanek, where his entire family was murdered.

Gutter was transferred to labour camps, including Buchenwald, and barely survived a death march to Theresienstadt before he was liberated in 1945. Following the war, he moved to South Africa and then immigrated to Canada in 1985.

Chris said he was also thankful for being able to hear survivor testimony first-hand.

"We're the last generation that can actually experience this trip with a survivor," Chris said.

In addition to hearing Gutter's testimony and learning about the horrors that other prisoners faced, Krangle recalled feeling very uneasy walking through the camps.

"When we were walking into the concentration camps, especially Auschwitz, my first thought was, 'Oh my gosh, I want to get out of here...' Just having that feeling while nothing terrible is happening to you, I can't imagine what people felt like when they were brought there. That struck a chord with me," she said.

Rosenblum, 28, said the experience gave him a new perspective on the dilemmas facing Jews who were desperate to survive.

"I never understood why our people didn't rebel violently on the whole when it became apparent the Nazis were rounding us up for execution," Rosenblum said.

But when he heard survivor stories, it made him reflect on how he would have behaved in the same situation.

"Whereas I used to think my decision would be to fight... I now believe that I would have stayed with my family and resisted by trying to help us survive day to day."

Now that the three-member delegation is home, they are each committed to sharing their experiences with friends and family.

"One of the things they talked about a lot was that we should never forget and that we should bring what we learned back to our families, friends and congregation, so they can experience it through us," Krangle said.

"I think it's just important to come home and tell people what you saw, show them pictures and encourage others to take the trip," Chris added.

On May 26, Chris, Krangle and Rosenblum will be participating in a panel discussion at Temple Sinai about their experience.

A very great day

In his review of Simon Sebag Montefiore's book Jerusalem: A Biography, Alex Joffe noted that "if [cities] have a consciousness, it is that encoded in literature by their lovers and haters. In this respect, no other city has a consciousness like Jerusalem's. No other city has had the level of literary attention lavished on Jerusalem. Athens, Rome, Paris, London, New York – none of them comes close."

And if it is true as Joffe writes – and we agree with him it is – that no city has been more the subject of literary attention than Jerusalem, it is equally true that no people has lavished more literary or other attention on Jerusalem than the Jewish People.

No people utters the name of Jerusalem in its daily prayers more than the Jewish People. No people turns its face in prayer each day three times a day toward Jerusalem other than the Jewish People. No people has ever been obliged to make its holiday pilgrimages to Jerusalem other than the Jewish People. No people has ever had Jerusalem as its political and legislative capital other than the Jewish People. No people has ever been more affected by expulsion from a city than the Jewish People has been by its several expulsions from Jerusalem. No people holds the city of Jerusalem and its ongoing restoration at the heart of its collective memory more than the Jewish People. No people yearns for a Jerusalem at peace more than the Jewish People.

Ever since the ancient Babylonians destroyed the First Temple in 586 BCE and Ezra and Nechemiah brought their people back from their exile less than 100 years later, it has always been thus. Indeed, it will always be thus.

It is no exaggeration to say that in large part, the deep, historical consciousness of the Jewish People has been formed out of the dust and trampled stones of the city from which it was violently exiled, torn away and torn away again.

But even through the long, hope-laden millennia of yearning to return to Zion, Jews had always lived in Jerusalem. Even in Silwan – the Arab community on the southern slopes outside the Old City of Jerusalem, which is frequently in the news due to ongoing tensions between its Arab residents and Jews who wish to move there – Jews lived in large numbers between the 1880s until the 1920s, when riots forced them out.

The point must be emphasized: Jews have always lived in Jerusalem. They were expelled from the Old City by the Jordanian army in 1948. And there are individuals and governments still today who would see that expulsion enshrined as the legal status quo. But that exile of the Jews from Jerusalem will be the last one.

On the 28th day of Iyar, 45 years ago this week, Jews returned to the Old City. And with the return of the Jews to all of Jerusalem, all worshippers of the three monotheistic faiths were also able to "return" to worship freely, without fear of expulsion, at their respective holy places, too.

That day in modern history was a very great day.

25 years ago in The CJN

In a thinly veiled reference to U.S. Jews, Austrian president Kurt Waldheim blamed "a lobby on the East Coast of America" for influencing the U.S. Justice Department to ban him from the United States. Waldheim was placed on a departmental watch list because of evidence of his complicity in Nazi war crimes in World War II.

Nakba Day marked at Tel Aviv U

As a native Calgarian who was actively involved in Canadian Jewish life in both Calgary and Toronto for more than 30 years before making aliyah in 1991, I am writing to you as a concerned Israeli mindful of the love, the work and support that the Canadian Jewish community has always had for Israel.

Last week, students at Tel Aviv University marked Nakba (catastrophe) Day – the date on the Gregorian calendar when Israel achieved statehood in 1948 – with an approved campus ceremony. Like many of us here, I hope that Canadians who support Tel Aviv U will make it known, as have members of Israel's Knesset, that it is disgraceful that such an event was held. This was an offence to Israel and its sovereignty. The university management should have cancelled the event. I hope that Canadians who financially support Tel Aviv U will voice their lack of support for such an event.

Parents sacrifice for day school (1)

As a 15-year-old Jewish day school student, I see the sacrifices parents make in order to provide their children with Jewish day school education ("Day school parents feel the tuition pinch," Live and Learn, March 8). A Jewish day school allows its students to develop their Jewish values and identity while still integrating a general studies curriculum. In addition, it maintains and gives a sense of community. Sadly, many parents turn to public schools due to the financial weight that a Jewish day school comes with. Parents are feeling burdened by the expensive Jewish day school tuition and are aggravated that nothing is being done by the leaders of our community.

It is completely unjust that the Ontario government is funding private Catholic schools, but still provides no funding for Jewish day schools. The lack of government funds forces parents to pay expensive tuitions, while at the same time paying for public schools through taxes. If funding for Jewish day school is not provided, then funding of all private schools should be cancelled. The situation is leaving parents with a hard choice – go into debt to send your children to Jewish day school or risk weakening an already threatened community.

Parents sacrifice for day school (2)

I was assigned to write a letter to the editor for my Grade 10 civics class, and while searching for an article to reply to, I stumbled across "Day school parents feel the tuition pinch" (Live and Learn, March 8). As a Jewish high school student whose parents make great sacrifices to send me to a day school, I find it very upsetting that the Ontario government has been paying full tuition for the education of Catholic religious students but not for Jewish schools. Many Jewish parents are struggling to keep their children in the Jewish day school system because of the rising tuition costs. Day school students benefit from positive influences that guarantee the next generation will grow up with strong, religious values. In a world with growing distractions, this is vital.

If the government refuses to fund the full cost of a private, religious school, then the least they can do is fund the general Ministry of Education courses within the private school curriculum. As it stands now, Jewish parents' hard-earned money is going toward the education of other religious students. If the government was to begin funding other religious schools, then many Jewish students whose families cannot afford the outrageous tuition prices would finally be able to receive a Jewish education

Jonathan Pollard

Jonathan Pollard has been in jail for 27 years for passing classified information to an ally during peacetime, an offence that has historically garnered an average sentence of two to four years. Jews and non-Jews alike must not rest until Pollard is free. Let us not forget that Pollard's actions, although illegal, were guided solely by a genuine concern for Israeli security. He has expressed remorse and overpaid his debt to society.

A tale of two Daniels

Rabbi and organic farmer trade jobs

Daniel Hoffmann and Rabbi Daniel Mikelberg

A rabbi and a farmer meet in a coffee shop. Both are named Daniel. The rabbi says to the farmer, "What if we traded jobs for a day?"

One year later, they did just that – they did each other's jobs, shadowing one another, each taking on the other's responsibilities. The work was often done collaboratively. This is what they learned.

Rabbi Daniel:

Every day is an adventure for a rabbi! Last week, I ventured out to the "hinterland" north of the city, to an organic farm known as The Cutting Veg. Trading jobs with Farmer Daniel Hoffmann, I was struck by the many parallels between synagogue life and the farming experience. Both professions plant seeds for the next generation. Both "rabbi-ing" and farming demand careful, dedicated labour and faith in the future. Both processes strengthen community and foster holiness.

I spent the morning crouching down, planting onion bulbs. Side by side, these bulbs would first produce green onions. These would then be harvested for the bulbs. I found myself obsessing about planting the onions just right. How could I make sure that the seeds would grow to their full potential? What would they look and taste like? Could I protect them from danger? I was given reassurances and told not to worry – my novice planting skills appeared to be just fine. I would have to let go of my fears and let Mother Nature take over. Would it be a good harvest? We did the best we could. Now we had to wait and see. Just like so many aspects of our lives, we were called upon to have faith.

This was messy work, but oh so meaningful! Days later, I still found remnants of the soil imbedded in my fingernails. I'm usually quite concerned about keeping things clean and tidy, but this did not appear to be an option on the farm. The experience was thus very real! I was reminded that even though I aspire to understand things with right and wrong, good and bad dichotomies, more often than not, this is not a reality. It's in those messy gray areas that we generally discover true value.

Farmer Daniel:

The mystique of the rabbinate has always intrigued me. So, when Rabbi Mikelberg suggested a job trade, I found myself at Temple Sinai Congregation in Toronto, all cleaned up, yarmulke-affixed, and ready to "rabbi it up!" Our day began with a morning Sabbath service where 200 kids connected through music, rituals and Jewish values. Whether you're four years old or 400, eating challah and singing Hinai Ma Tov never gets old, as far as I'm concerned.

We then met with a representative from Jewish Family & Child to explore how Temple Sinai could take a leadership role in addressing the abuse of women within the Jewish community. Since I also have a background in social work, this had particular interest for me, as I recognize violence against women not as a "women's issue," but as an issue that needs all of our attention.

Next, we met with a young man in the process of converting to Judaism and visited two congregants in the hospital to offer support and lovingkindness.

This was followed by an evening Sabbath service, which embodied the themes of relaxation, celebration and meaning.

But it was the moments in between these activities that were most special to me. In preparation for the evening sermon, we checked out the Torah portion of the week, which addressed the themes of holiness and of atoning for one's impurities. Lively discussion ensued. Is it holiness we should aim for, or wholeness? Are we to try to eliminate our impurities, our flaws, our mistakes, or rather to keep working at being more conscious of them? In our talks, we shared what motivates us to do the work we do. We discussed our relationship with prayer and with our spiritual practices. What a privilege to have access to a rabbi for an entire day!

Rabbi Daniel:

Over lunch, each farmer reflected on his or her most loved fruit and vegetable. We were asked to think about the growing process of our favourite foods. Such an important question, and yet one that I rarely consider. Hard to appreciate that food never just magically appears on one's plate! Too often I forget that fruits and vegetables travel a long way before they end up in the supermarket. We have a Jewish tool to open our eyes to this pathway – blessings! Voicing our blessings enables us to pause and express thanks for our many gifts.

That afternoon on the farm, I also chopped potatoes. I learned that potato bushes grow from segments of potatoes that have an embedded eye. It struck me that we were cutting up perfectly good potatoes in order to put them back in the ground! Was this productive? Yes! In fact, each single potato would go on to produce dozens more. Again, this is reflective of Jewish wisdom. As we build for future generations, we sometimes need to make painful sacrifices.

Farmer Daniel

Toward the end of the day, a congregant approached me: "How's it been to be a rabbi for a day? It must be quite different from farming."

I thought about it for a moment. "Not at all actually."

The more we farmed and "rabbi-ed" together, the more the similarities between our working lives became apparent. Rabbi Mikelberg's work is all about healthy relationships – with congregants, temple staff members, fellow clergy, colleagues in the community. On the farm, we too focus on healthy relationships – with the members of our Community Supported Agriculture program, with our staff, interns, volunteers, community partners and with other farmers. Rabbi Mikelberg spends his day sowing seeds – seeds that grow community and Jewish engagement. On the farm, we not only sow seeds literally (peas, beets, garlic – yum!), but we also aim to sow seeds that enhance people's quality of life and support long-term ecological health.

And to be a rabbi requires a great deal of relinquishing of control. When we went to the hospital, we didn't know whether we'd be greeted warmly or with hostility (and indeed we got both). And in farming, we can work our butts off, but we have no control over the weather or the outcome of the harvest.

As we discussed how we approach our work, the synchronicities continued to reveal themselves. We each view our work as part of the Jewish value of tikkun olam – repairing of the world. We aim to be of service to those with whom we interact – perhaps a member of the congregation in need of support, perhaps a farmer's market attendee needing cooking tips.

Rabbi Daniel:

Significantly, we worked the soil as part of a farming community. This was holy labour! Together we would make a real impact. We planted more than 10,000 onion bulbs that morning. On the drive home, I found myself reflecting on the importance of farmers! Away from the city, they are often way off our radar. We need to remember and appreciate that their love of the earth, their hard work and their wholesome intentions are key to making the world a healthy place. As I resume my more traditional rabbi tasks, I will now bring renewed emphasis to opening my eyes to the natural wonders of our world.

Farmer Daniel:

I found myself realizing during our two days together that tikkun olam is possible everywhere. We encountered many others who also aim to be of service: the farm intern who works as a flight attendant and looks out for her passengers with such care; the members of the temple's social action committee who give their time, energy and spirit to build community and promote social justice. If my day of "rabbi-ing" taught me anything, it's that it doesn't matter so much what you do, whether you're a rabbi, a farmer, a business executive or a volunteer. It's not so much what you do, but the intention, the kavanah, you bring to it.

Intimate strangers: lessons from the Book of Ruth

How do we treat the "strangers" among us?

As we move from Pesach to Shavuot, our framework shifts from a festival whose narrative arc anchors the collective memory of suffering as foreign dwellers in someone else's land to a festival whose central narrative recollects a foreign woman coming to live in ours.

Although the two festivals' stories took place centuries apart, in Jewish time as we live it, they are separated by only seven weeks – short enough to make the association. Our texts caution us repeatedly to treat the stranger fairly, kindly and justly, because we were once strangers. From that experience, we were to learn an ethics born of empathic knowledge. Eventually, our ancestors became the dominant culture in a homeland where other people sojourned as strangers. So how did we do?

If we take the story of Ruth as illustrative, our record is mixed. The Moabite woman bonds with her Israelite mother-in-law and follows her to a place whose language, cultural habits, and religious norms are outside her comfort zone. The two women live in a poverty consigned by patriarchal inheritance laws. Although Ruth adopts Naomi's ways and labours to support the two of them, she is constantly referred to as Rut hamo'avi'a, Ruth the Moabite, emphasizing her status as outsider.

Some people treat her with exemplary respect. Her mother-in-law values her beyond measure. The man who will eventually become her husband invites her to glean in his fields, to join with his extended household, effectively bringing the stranger inside his inner circle. And yet at the same time, Megillat Ruth hints at other attitudes. That Boaz must warn his men not to touch her, or that the two women languish in poverty with no help from extended family, indicates that life was difficult for the stranger.

The story of Ruth boils down the plight of the outsider, the disempowered, to a family affair. You could say that the family functions in the text as a microcosm for the larger society. You could say, too, that the family – then, as well as now – is the place where we feel most challenged by the incursion of the stranger and her strangeness, but also most motivated to meet that challenge.

In families – as in communities – strangers come to us from without, much like Ruth. They bring different experiences, customs, perspectives and ways of being, that can both unsettle and enrich us. Strangers can also come from within the family or community. We share with them background and memories. But they (or we) make choices and see things in ways that "other" them from within, leave them feeling foreign in the familiar.

People often – and correctly – speak of the Book of Ruth as teaching us, in ways still relevant today, how to treat the foreigner, the stranger and the convert. It also, I believe, bears insightfully on some very modern issues of family.

Sara R. Horowitz

in Toronto

None of these family units in the megillah look the way they are "supposed to" look: not the two sons', who marry Moabite women and forget to come home; not the two widows struggling for sustenance without a man around the house, and not the old landowner who marries a much younger distant relative. But families can work, even when they're unconventional. The glue is a composite of love, commitment, support and also openness – appreciation for who the other is.

Perhaps more than ever before, our families lean toward the unconventional. Like Ruth's, our families are more than ancestral – and sometimes they're not ancestral at all. We extend the intimacy of family to biological children, to children of spouses and to children of strangers.

Like Boaz and like Ruth, we choose to be lovingly responsible for those for whom we have no a priori obligation, save the generic responsibilities of all humans for one another. We stretch our tent to encompass children who develop their own values, partners who evolve, parents who branch out on new paths, and neighbours and friends without other family.

We learn from Ruth that the unconventional and unfamiliar – whether familial or societal – has the capacity not only to challenge us, but to sustain us, stretch us, nourish us and renew us.

It's hard to pray in English

Worship services in Reform congregations almost invariably include prayers in the vernacular. Influenced by contemporary feminism and its stress on gender equality, new editions of Reform prayer books in English have chosen inclusive language rather than literal translations of the original Hebrew. In order to be politically correct, the Union for Reform Judaism even has a book of Haftarot that has neutered the biblical texts to make sure that "sexist" language doesn't come over the lips of readers.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

The New American Haggadah by Jonathan Safran Foer and Nathan Englander, published shortly before Pesach, has chosen to ignore this trend. It translates the texts literally and refers to God as "Lord" and "King," and consistently uses the masculine personal pronoun when appropriate.

Despite going against the current, or perhaps because of it, the book has become an instant success and is likely to be used at many Seder tables in years to come.

Those who appreciate the beautiful and apt translations have thus reacted against what has become an accepted norm among English-speaking liberal Jews. And even advocates of gender sensitive language admit they cannot do anything about the Hebrew prayers, because Hebrew doesn't lend itself to neutral terminology.

This means people who wouldn't say "Lord" or "King" in English do so, seemingly happily, in Hebrew or in, say, French and German, which also don't allow for the kind of neutral expressions that are possible in English.

In addition to including references to the matriarchs each time the patriarchs are mentioned, the synagogue where I pray in Jerusalem – and where, of course, only Hebrew is used – is trying to occasionally address God by the feminine Yah instead of the masculine Adonai. But most of the texts remain intact and, mercifully, no attempts are being made to tamper with biblical readings.

In the choice between accuracy and what they deem to be relevance, Reform Jews in the English-speaking world have largely opted for the latter. But an article in the April 4 issue of the Forward by David. A.M. Wilensky, although he reports to have been reared in an American Reform congregation, challenges this trend.

He's 23 and describes himself as being part of a generation "nearly defined by our rejection of ideologies that require exclusive allegiance." Supporting the translations in the New American Haggadah, he writes: "If genderless translation is an example of ideology affecting liturgy, it should come as no surprise that a hip, contemporary liturgy would eschew that in favour of a more straightforward approach to liturgical translation."

I have grandchildren of Wilensky's generation, but in this case, I may be younger than my years. Like him, I'm a staunch advocate of the equality of women in all aspects of religious life. At Holy Blossom Temple, we made sure that almost always, at least one of its rabbis would be a woman and that the congregation would practise and consistently promote gender equality in all aspects of synagogue life.

Such equality, successfully spearheaded by Reform Judaism, has now also been embraced by the Conservative movement, despite dissent in some Canadian congregations. Modern Orthodoxy is currently struggling with the problem and showing signs of progress.

But Wilensky's words resonate with me as no doubt they do with many others: "When we convince ourselves that we've solved the problem of centuries of exclusion of women from Jewish ritual and narrative by reducing God to a cumbersome asexual matter of grammar, we do ourselves a great disservice. We sweep our people's treatment of women under the rug."

As more and more Reform Jews come to know enough Hebrew to appreciate the liturgy in the original and, as a result, fewer prayers are read in English, the more Wilensky's words will resonate with them as well. Perhaps at times they'll even choose the Hebrew to avoid bland translations.

I surmise that my rabbinic colleagues who aspire to be politically correct will disagree. Happily, there's no clause in Reform Judaism that would condemn me for heresy. As the Central Conference of American Rabbis recently recognized the 50th anniversary of my ordination, it may ascribe my unease with gender sensitive language in prayer to theological sclerosis that's to be humoured rather than rebuked.

The way I often deal with my discomfort with doctored translations is to escape into the Hebrew original, even when the congregation reads in English. Some might call this creative liturgical maladjustment.

Israel's ties with Turkey remain troubled

Nearly two years after Israeli commandos stormed the Mavi Marmara, a Turkish ship in a pro-Palestinian flotilla of six vessels trying to break Israel's naval blockade of the Gaza Strip, Israel's bilateral relationship with Turkey, once a key ally, has yet to recover from this violent incident on the high seas.

The confrontation took place on May 31, 2010, in international waters in the Mediterranean Sea, claiming the lives of eight Turkish nationals and one American of Turkish origin and injuring several Israeli soldiers. Turkey demanded an apology, compensation and the lifting of the siege. Israel, having warned Turkey that the flotilla would be challenged, refused to apologize.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

With Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan having described the raid as "state terrorism," Turkey recalled its ambassador, Ahmet Oguz Celikkol. Turkey's decision to recall Celikkol occurred several months after he was publicly humiliated by Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon in a bizarre encounter in which he asked him to explain the broadcast of a provocative Turkish television drama deemed to be anti-Israel. At Turkey's request, Ayalon eventually apologized, but his mistreatment of Celikkol left scars on both sides.

Tensions flared yet again in September 2011 with the release of the Palmer report, commissioned by the United Nations to study Israel's 2010 raid. The report validated Israel's naval blockade of Gaza – which has been controlled by Hamas since 2006 – as legal and appropriate, but noted that Israel had used "excessive and unreasonable force" in stopping the Turkish ship.

The Palmer report was released after an Israeli panel, the Turkel Commission, concluded that Israeli commanders had acted in self-defence, and that Israel's siege of Gaza was in accord with international law. Erdogan condemned the findings, saying they lacked "value and credibility." Certainly, the Turkel report was at odds with a Turkish report that charged Israel with violating the norms of international law and branded Israel's raid as "tantamount to banditry and piracy."

Much to Israel's disappointment, Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu rejected the Palmer report and announced that Turkey would expel Israel's ambassador in Ankara, Gabby Levy; downgrade ties with Israel and suspend all military agreements.

In the wake of Levy's expulsion, Erdogan threatened to dispatch war ships to the eastern Mediterranean. He also suggested that Israel's raid had been a "cause for war," leaving the impression that Turkey might use military means to deal with Israel's blockade of Gaza.

A harsh critic of Israel's 2009 invasion of Gaza, he warned that Turkey's bilateral relations with Israel – which reached a peak of intensity in 2005 when he visited Israel – would "never be normal again" if Israel failed to comply with his three basic demands. Turkey's embassy in Washington, meanwhile, issued a communiqué saying Turkey would seek to prosecute the Israeli commandos who had commandeered the Mavi Marmara.

For the past two years, Israel has attempted to heal the breach, with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu having called for a normalization of relations in the spirit of friendship and with Defence Minister Ehud Barak having said that the dispute can be resolved through a "creative formula."

Two Israeli envoys, Joseph Ciechanover, a senior diplomat, and Moshe Ya'alon, the strategic affairs minister and vice-premier, discussed the issue with Turkish representatives. These talks failed because Israel prefers to issue a statement of regret rather than an outright official apology.

The United States and Germany have both urged Turkey to rebuild ties with Israel, saying they are critical for regional stability and security. Davutoglu has said that foreign mediation is not necessary, since "the demands of Turkey are clear."

Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, a hardliner in Israel's conflict with Turkey, claims that Israel has no reason to apologize. "We will not be Turkey's punching bag," he said, noting that Turkey's policies are to blame for the breakdown in relations.

According to the daily Yediot Achronot, Lieberman's aides called for drastic retaliatory measures to be taken against Turkey, notably Israeli co-operation with the Kurdistan Workers' Party, Turkey's arch enemy. But Netanyahu's office distanced itself from Lieberman's supposed plan, saying Israel's objective is to ease tensions and renew relations with Turkey.

Ya'alon, having accused the Turkish government of fomenting the crisis by allowing the Mavi Marmara to leave port in the first place, believes that Israel's alliance with Turkey is finished. His assessment is shared by Efraim Inbar, the director of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv.

In a paper, Get Tough with Turkey, he claims that Turkey's demands are "unreasonable" and that an Israeli apology will not change its "anti-Israel policy." In Inbar's estimation, Turkey's Islamist government has aligned itself with "radical Islamist forces, siding with Iran, the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, Hamas in Gaza and Hezbollah in Lebanon." He adds, "Within the framework of the new Turkish foreign policy, good relations with Israel are a burden."

Yigal Schleifer, a blogger and journalist who writes on Turkish affairs, counters that Israel is at least partly at fault for the impasse.

Israel neither understands the growing resonance of the unresolved Palestinian problem in Turkey nor does Israel grasp Turkey's view that its occupation of the West Bank is a source of instability as well as an obstacle in Turkey's ambition to construct a more harmonious regional order in the Middle East.

Erdogan, a strong advocate of a two-state solution, has blamed Israeli "intransigence" for the deadlock in the Mideast peace process. Turkey's President Abdullah Gul – who has hailed U.S. President Barack Obama's call on Israel to pull back to the pre-1967 lines within the context of mutually agreed land swaps – has written that "a dignified and viable Palestine, living side by side with Israel, will not diminish [Israel's] security, but fortify it."

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan

The Israeli government, having rejected Obama's proposal, is displeased with Turkey's courtship of Hamas and incensed with Erdogan's claim that Hamas is a "political party" rather than "a terror organization."

Israel's bilateral relations with Turkey, though extremely strained, have not broken down completely. Two-way trade remains vibrant. Turkey, in 2010, sent two firefighting aircraft to extinguish a major blaze on Mount Carmel, while Israel dispatched humanitarian aid to Turkey after an earthquake there in 2011.

Since the Mavi Marmara incident, however, Israel has upgraded ties with Greece, Turkey's rival, and, together with southern Cyprus, has begun exploring for gas in the eastern Mediterranean. Turkey, having laid a claim to natural resources there too, has described Israel's offshore drilling as "madness." Clearly, the scramble for gas in the Mediterranean Sea has added yet another complicated layer to Israel's troubled and convoluted relationship with Turkey.

Chabad Israeli centre takes shape in Vaughan

Meir Shenhav
Special to The CJN

What a surreal picture! At a busy and noisy construction site, workers in white or yellow helmets mix cement, while others carry blocks or lift steel rods. In the midst of it all stands a bearded man wearing a black helmet, a black suit, white shirt and a tie.

Rabbi Israel Landa, the spiritual leader of the Chabad Israeli Community of Toronto, is deeply involved with all the details of the centre's new building, what he calls "the project of his life."

The new centre is rising fast, near Walmart at Bathurst and Centre streets in Thornhill, Ont. I find this relationship somehow symbolic, as in both places you can find something for everyone at a reasonable price.

Rabbi Landa shakes my hand warmly. His eyes are glowing when he tells me that the building's steel structure is complete and the walls are going up. "With help from the One Above and participation from the ones below, we hope to be up and running for the upcoming High Holidays," Rabbi Landa said.

There's a huge need for a synagogue geared to Toronto's Hebrew-speaking community. Rabbi Landa said Israelis often feel disconnected from the wider Jewish population. Bathurst and Centre is a central point between the older established Jewish neighbourhoods and the newer communities, and the area itself is heavily populated with Israelis. So it's the perfect location.

Rabbi Israel Landa at the Chabad Israeli construction site

The Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre, which currently holds services and study groups at the Chabad Lubavitch Centre in Thornhill, doesn't have a standard membership formula, as do other synagogues or similar institutions, since the concept of "belonging" to a synagogue and paying membership dues is foreign to Israelis.

According to Rabbi Landa, the community has a high number of participants at holiday programs and a large number of families who donate to various causes. In order to survive and thrive, the centre will have to introduce the structure of a North America Jewish organization, with requirements for registration and membership. At the same time, he emphasized, Chabad Israeli will never abandon the open-door policy of an Israeli institution.

Families in the community will be offered a unit of partnership, a "spiritual share" for $2,500, to be paid in a lump sum or over time, he said.

The new centre will provide cultural gatherings, a Hebrew-speaking nursery and adult education programs, as well as activities for children and teenagers and special programs for families in need. Although the new centre will target Hebrew-speakers, any Jew who is comfortable participating in Hebrew-language programs or services is welcome.

"Occasionally, we will have opportunities and gatherings where we'll combine English as well, for the benefit of families with members who speak only English," Rabbi Landa said.

Rabbi Landa doesn't anticipate any conflicts with the activities of Chabad @Flamingo, which is in the same neighbourhood as the new centre. "We're all on the same team. We seek to complement each other," he said.

"Whereas Chabad@Flamingo is neighbourhood-based, Chabad Israeli is not geared to a specific area, but rather to a population who find themselves in many different areas of the GTA."

When asked if Chabad Israeli would welcome families that need to drive on Shabbat to attend services, Rabbi Landa replied: "Judaism is 24/7. Activities and services span a very wide range of needs and aspirations. We're active every day of the week. To paraphrase the Lubavitcher Rebbe, we wish to be like a flashlight to show the path, but not to judge or police."

The financing of the new building is not yet complete and Rabbi Landa replied carefully when asked about it. "We managed to raise funds to cover what is visible to the eye. For the remainder of the building, the inside, we're still trying to raise the funds now," he said. "When the community sees that the dream has become a reality, they'll make the effort and become partners with us."

As I bid the rabbi farewell, I see one of the workers turn to him and ask him a question. The rabbi answered and the worker smiled.

I sense that words of the Torah were imparted.

Holocaust educator to receive Pioneer Award

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Human rights advocate and Holocaust educator Toni Silberman is one of five Canadian immigrants who will be honoured next month for her outstanding contribution to her community.

Skills For Change, a non-profit organization that helps internationally educated immigrants acquire work and succeed in Ontario, will present Silberman – the vice-chair of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and the national chair of B'nai Brith's Commission on Holocaust Education – with a Pioneers for Change award on June 5. The New Pioneer Awards celebrate inspiring newcomers and bring together a large and diverse community of people who believe that immigration is an important part of building Canada's future.

Among her many accomplishments, Silberman has spent 16 years working for the Ontario Human Rights Commission, is an adviser on the National Task Force on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research, and recently served as chair of the Jewish-Canadian advisory committee for the Community Historical Recognition Program, which is a government initiative to acknowledge Canada's denial of the SS St. Louis – a ship carrying German Jewish refugees desperately seeking a safe haven in 1939 – entry into Canadian waters.

Silberman credited her Holocaust survivor parents, as well as other survivors and scholars, for fostering her passion for researching and learning about the Shoah.

"For me, Holocaust education and challenging Holocaust denial are visceral," Silberman said.

"As children of Holocaust survivors, born in a displaced persons camp in Stuttgart, Germany, my sister and I were raised in a home in which, over the years, our myriad questions about my parents' prewar lives and their horrific experiences in the camps were answered truthfully, albeit tearfully. They recognized that we had an obvious need to know, as well as a right to know."

Toni Silberman

Silberman explained that her parents spent four years apart in concentration camps. Although they survived, as did Silberman's grandmother and uncle, most of their family, including their two-year-old son, was murdered during the Holocaust. Their struggles continued when they were sent to a displaced persons camp in Germany.

Her father, who obtained a law degree in Poland a year before the war broke out, wasn't granted entry into Canada until he trained himself to be an underwear cutter.

Silberman and her family arrived in Canada in 1950 on her second birthday. Her passion to learn more about that dark chapter in her family's history shaped her professional life and continues to do so.

"I continued researching and learning as much as I could and, in addition to speaking at commemorative events, got involved… in developing resources and programs, lobbying the government for recognition, and creating opportunities for the reality and lessons of the Holocaust to reach as wide a spectrum of the Jewish and non-Jewish population as possible."

Judy Csillag, Skills For Change education and project leader, whose parents are also both survivors, said honouring Silberman is meaningful to her.

"This is the first time in the 20-year history of the awards that a Jewish person is being honoured," Csillag said. "We wanted to pay homage to the large and successful Jewish immigration that has added so much to this city and this country, culturally, economically and philanthropically."

Csillag explained that for the past 19 years, the organization hosted New Pioneer Awards to honour new Canadians who overcame the challenges of immigration to succeed in their field.

"This being the 20th year, we decided that we're going to go back to the people who were the nation builders, the ones who cleared the road and made it possible for the huge immigration we're seeing today to be successful," she said.

The CIBC-sponsored event will also honour former governor general Adrienne Clarkson, who came to Canada as a refugee from Hong Kong with her parents in 1942; Navin Chandaria, who immigrated to Canada from Kenya in 1975 to become CEO of the Conros Corporation; Colombian born and educated Dr. Alex Jadad, who is a physician, educator, researcher and public advocate, and Vahan Kololian, the managing partner of TerraNova Partners LP.

Each of the five recipients are the subject of a short documentary. The films will be screened at the June 5 award ceremony.

Silberman, who was awarded the Queen Elizabeth II Diamond Jubilee Medal for her service to the community earlier this year, said being recognized by Skills For Change is humbling.

"To be recognized formally and publicly for doing something for which I feel such passion, which is so inbred in my DNA, is truly humbling," she said. It acknowledges not just the end product, but the process – the history, my familial background and upbringing, my parents and my beloved late husband Sam's lessons about humanity and compassion, gratitude and appreciation… that compelled the choices I've made, that have allowed me to reach this point."

New director for Ontario Jewish Archives

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

It is perhaps fitting that Dara Solomon began her new job as director of the Ontario Jewish Archives at the beginning of May, which has been designated Jewish Heritage Month in Ontario.

Not only does the experienced museum curator bring a new face to the archives, she has also set up a new Facebook page for the important but still fairly low-profile institution, located in the Lipa Green Centre on Bathurst Street.

Solomon, a native Torontonian who returned here this spring after an absence of 13 years, was most recently employed as curator of the Contemporary Jewish Museum in San Francisco.

In her six years there, she developed numerous impressive exhibitions, aided by an annual exhibition budget of $1.5 million. One of the things she enjoyed most was "helping the community tell their narratives," and she plans on helping Toronto's Jews tell their community-related stories as well. (Of course, her budget here will be only a tiny fraction of what it was in San Francisco.)

Dara Solomon, the new director of the Ontario Jewish Archives.

"I was drawn to this job because the archives has this incredible collection of documents and artifacts, but hasn't really had a very public face," she said. "Lots of historians come and use the archives, but nobody really knows what's here. The opportunity to make that material much more accessible and to tell those stories really excited me."

An alumnus of Bialik Hebrew Day School, Solomon has a good working knowledge of Hebrew and can read some Yiddish. She earned an honours BA in art history and religion from the University of Toronto in 1997, then an MA in arts administration from the School of the Art Institute of Chicago. She is married with a 2-1/2-year-old daughter.

Her family saga seems thoroughly woven into our community's past. Her mother was part of the Kokotow family from Kirkland Lake. Her maternal grandfather was a bottler of Coca-Cola in that northern Ontario town. On the paternal side of her family, her grandfather was one of five brothers in the trash business in Toronto and her grandmother was part of Toronto's well-known Grafstein family.

On the archives' new Facebook page (http://www.facebook.com/OntarioJewishArchives), Solomon plans to tell the story of one or more objects from the archival collection each week, hoping to spur interest, discussion and memories.

"The great thing about social media is the conversation that it starts, so hopefully people will start adding to the stories online," she said.

She has already started researching an exhibit on landsmanschaft societies that the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto plans to show in the so-called "Bridge of Hope" between the Lipa Green Centre and the Holocaust Museum being developed in the neighbouring Prosserman JCC.

She's also keen on inviting artists to do projects with the archives, for instance re-photographing old synagogues that may have been previously photographed half a century ago. "You can tell a whole new story by having these two elements juxtaposed together," she said.

Perhaps most important from the client point of view, she wants to put sections of the archives' catalogue on the Internet so that researchers can access it remotely.

"It's definitely a priority. I think that all these stories I want to tell, you can't tell them without imagery. And I think that putting [the catalogue] online is where you're going to get lots of people involved."

Founded in 1973, the Ontario Jewish Archives has had only three directors in its nearly 40 years of institutional life.

The founding director was the late Stephen Speisman, whose strength, according to Brooky Robins, chair of the archives' nine-person board, was in "collection and acquistion."

Its second director was Ellen Scheinberg, who arrived in 2002. Scheinberg oversaw the computerization of a large part of the archives' 5,000 cubic feet of textual records, as well as the digitalization of many of its 50,000 photographs, and the compilation of several virtual exhibits. "Now we're at another level, where we want to do more outreach and more exhibits," Robins said.

Scheinberg left the Ontario Jewish Archives in 2010. She subsequently worked for the Archives of Ontario for a short period and earlier this year founded her own company, Heritage Professionals. A department of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the archives was without a director for nearly a year and a half while the board searched for the right person.

THE WAR IS OVER, BUT IZZY'S BATTLE CONTINUES...

"They look after you at Beit Halochem, and they ask for nothing in return."

In January 2009, Izzy Ezagui and 7 soldiers in his unit of the IDF were anxiously waiting in a tent by the Gaza border during Operation Cast Lead. Just before they were about to go in as reinforcements, rockets slammed into their tent. Izzy and 3 others were seriously wounded.

When the smoke cleared, Izzy saw that part of his arm was missing and that he was bleeding profusely. With all his strength, he walked to the nearest bomb shelter where the medics began treating him. Despite losing 40% of his blood, Izzy remained awake and lucid.

He is an exceptional young man who made Aliyah at 19, entered the army, was gravely wounded, and still returned to serve Israel as a commander in the Givati Brigade. "I believe in the nation of Israel and our history. I feel honoured to be able to participate in protecting Israel." Izzy received a "Citation of Excellence" from President Peres in 2011.

Izzy goes to Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv where he socializes with other disabled members, swims, works out in the comprehensive Fitness Centre and receives physiotherapy.

The specialized therapies, sports and cultural programs along with the state-of-the-art equipment and facilities in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Naharya and Beer Sheva assist the wounded in their rehabilitation.

Emunah dinner aids children in Israel

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Wednesday night's annual Emunah Family in Israel Dinner is thought to be the organization's biggest one yet, according to the dinner co-chairs Edie Kalb and Sari Rosenblum.

This year, the dinner was in honour of Phil and Faygie Schwartz, Toronto philanthropists who have been extremely generous in helping the Jewish community both in Canada and Israel. The Schwartzes, who are among the founders of Toronto's Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot high schools, are making aliyah in the fall of this year. They will be joining three of their four children, as well as their grandchildren and great-grandchildren in Israel.

"They are pillars in our Jewish community," said Rosenblum of the honorees, adding that it was their commitment and generosity that ensured the success of this year's Emunah dinner and fundraising efforts.

Emunah Women of Canada is a national non-profit organization of women who volunteer and fundraise primarily to benefit Israel's children, women and senior citizens. The organization is an affiliate of World Emunah, which has been around since the 1930s.

The funds collected from this year's dinner, which was held at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue, are being donated to Neve Michael Children's Village in Pardes Chana, Israel.

Neve Michael is a safe haven for children who have been separated from their biological parents due to traumatic circumstances, including alcohol and drug addiction and abuse. The children are given housing in a family environment with therapists and counsellors who live on site. They are educated and cared for until they are 18 years old and able to join society as healthy adults.

Faygie and Phil Schwartz were honoured at the Emunah Family in Israel Dinner.

"Any Jewish child in danger can go to this place to be safe and sheltered from whatever horrible situation they're going through," said Rosenblum about Neve Michael. Kalb added that "children often get the brunt of whatever dysfunction is going on at home," explaining the importance of helping the kids to recover and grow.

Currently, the centre houses about 300 children aged four to 18, but they are planning on building additional housing and facilities. "This expansion project is because [Neve Michael] needs upgrading, renovating, expanding to help more children," said Kalb.

In addition to the on-site therapy, education and family units, Neve Michael runs a 24-hour crisis centre to remove children from immediate danger around the clock. Eventually, these children are transferred to the village, where they, too, can receive the care and security they need.

"They get that sense of family and love and community," said Rosenblum.

Most of the children leave the facility and go on to lead successful and safe lives as adults. "They become quite productive members of society," said Kalb.

The Schwartzes visited Neve Michael on a recent trip to Israel and were able to see the work of the important institution that they are helping. "We were impressed by the staff that we met, the counsellors that we met," said Faygie, who herself has been an Emunah volunteer for many years.

Phil added that while Neve Michael exists for sad reasons, it is a place that "results in happiness."

The Schwartzes said they are grateful for the opportunity to help Emunah with this cause. "We are extremely impressed by the hard work, integrity and drive of the [Emunah] volunteers," said Phil.

The Schwartzes feel that the work of both Emunah and Neve Michael are integral to helping the Jewish community. As Faygie said, using the Hebrew phrase, the organizations deserve a lot of respect for their efforts, "kol hakavod!"

Madrassah barred from Toronto public schools

Compiled by CJN Staff

A Toronto Islamic school has been told it can no longer use Toronto public school facilities while police conduct a hate crimes investigation.

The Toronto District School Board (TDSB) revoked the permit of the East End Madrassah after news reports showed the school was using materials that called Jews "treacherous," "crafty," accused them of conspiring to kill the Islamic Prophet Muhammad, and in a section on jihad, compared the beliefs of the Jews with those of Nazis.

David Spiro

The madrassah had contracted with the TDSB to hold its classes at the David and Mary Thomson Collegiate Institute, a public school in the Lawrence Avenue and Brimley Road area. The madrassah is run by the Islamic Shia Ithna-Asheri Jamaat (ISIJ), located in Thornhill.

TDSB spokesperson Shari Schwartz-Maltz said the board is asking for a meeting with representatives of the madrassah to ensure its teachings comply with the board's policies.

"We've had a relationship with the organization for about 30 years, and in that 30 years, we've had no complaints whatsoever," she said.

The madrassah issued a statement backing away from the materials: "We unreservedly apologize to the Jewish community for the unintentional offence that the item has caused.

"Our curriculum is not intended to promote hatred towards any individual or group of people, rather the children are taught to respect and value other faiths, beliefs and to uphold Canada's basic values of decency and tolerance," it said in the statement.

Jewish organizations applauded the TDSB for rescinding the madrassah's use of public school facilities.

"We commend the TDSB for moving to suspend the East End Madrassah's permit as an excellent first step, in accordance with the terms of the permit which allow the board to revoke such arrangements with or without cause. Given the presence of antisemitic passages in the curriculum, and the dubious activism of its religious leadership, it is clear that the madrassah has disqualified itself as a partner with the school board on any level. We are hopeful that the board comes to this conclusion in due course and that the madrassah is not welcomed back into our public schools," said David Spiro, Greater Toronto co-chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

"We are pleased to note the TDSB has taken action in response to the alarming antisemitic hate taught to Muslim schoolchildren at Toronto's East End Madrassah," said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC).

"We hope the school board will now go one step further and put a plan in place to ensure no group is ever targeted as the Jewish community has been, and that ancient hatreds are never again endorsed and encouraged in Toronto classrooms," he added.

FSWC said it remained concerned that this type of anti-Jewish material might be taught in other Islamic facilities in Ontario. It welcomed any initiative by school boards to investigate all forms of racism and intolerance in the education system.

Lebovic Campus' Schwartz/Reisman Centre enjoys incredible success even before its doors open

Sharp Family Atrium, facing east

By Daniel Horowitz & Taali Lester Tollman

With the Schwartz/Reisman Centre on York Region's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus set to open, excitement is building up north like never before. For months, community members have been watching with great anticipation as the building was under construction, keeping track of all the special facilities the Centre will offer.

Although its doors don't open until June 1st, registration has already soared to 40% above projections with over 2,100 members signed up and ready to go, demonstrating that the need for the programs and services provided by the Schwartz/Reisman Centre is stronger than ever.

The Lebovic Campus location of the Jack & Pat Kay Centre Camp has already reached its original target of 250 campers, with sales still going strong. Meanwhile, the Gorman Shore Goodman Childhood Education Centre, which opens in September, is already 75 percent full.

"We knew there was a big need for this type of Jewish community centre in the region," Sherry Kulman, executive director of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre explained. "UJA Federation had the vision to build in York Region, understanding the Jewish population growth that was and is still taking place. It is a very exciting time to be a resident here. We know that the Schwartz/Reisman Centre will become the premier place for young families, teens, adults and seniors alike to spend their free time, enjoying our state-of-the-art facilities." (continued on opposite page)

"Years in the making, the Schwartz/Reisman Centre on the Lebovic Campus is finally getting ready to open its doors – and its arms - to the residents of York Region," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "Life north of Steeles Avenue will never be the same again, as so many of the services and programs needed to live full, healthy and happy Jewish lives will all be available under one roof. Registration is already higher than we ever anticipated, and the opening is still a week away. # Israel not likely to hit Iran, retired officer says

Staff Reporter

You can count Oded Erez among the former Israeli military intelligence officers who don't think their country should attack Iran's nuclear facilities.

It's not that Iran has suddenly become a peace-loving neighbour, wishing nothing but goodwill for the Jewish state. It's just that he believes the job is better left to the United States.

"Israel won't do that dirty job. If a decision is made to do an attack, the Americans are better [positioned] to get better results on a first attack" with its air power and cruise missiles. And Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has over the last two years successfully made the case that Iran is not strictly an Israeli problem, it's a concern for the entire world, Erez said.

Whether the United States will, in fact, takes military action draws a shrug from the former head of Israeli Air Force intelligence. That's an open question, he suggests, but nevertheless, he believes Israel can live with a nuclear Iran.

Erez, now retired from the IDF, was in Toronto recently to speak to a small gathering assembled by CAASI, the Canadian Association for Aviation and Space in Israel. Like others in the Israeli military, he continued his career in the business world, serving on the board of Imagesat International and Palram Industries. He's currently a board member of the Israeli Air Force Association and of the Fisher Institute of Air and Space Strategic Studies.

In an interview with The CJN, Erez said predicting Iran's actions "depends how you see Ahmadinejad as a leader. Is he crazy, or is there certain logic there?

"I think he's logical in his own way and knows if he'll start something with Israel, he'll be repaid. And he doesn't want to be repaid."

Erez believes Ahmadinejad wants to make Iran more important, more powerful – a regional hegemon. "And he's showing off as the big player. 'You want to tell me what to do? I'll tell you what to do.' That's his thinking," Erez said.

Erez said the Saudis should be more worried than Israel about Iranian ambitions.

Turning to the area of his technical expertise, unmanned drones and satellites, Erez said both technologies have made surveillance a much safer activity.

In his early years in the Israeli Air Force, Erez flew surveillance aircraft, and in 1964, during a flight over Syrian territory, he discovered, by accident, an unknown air base.

Satellite technology made gathering such intelligence much safer, especially after the Soviet Union developed anti-aircraft missiles – the kind that shot down American U2 pilot Gary Powers.

Satellites also provide information in real time. Israel now has seven or eight satellites in orbit, most of them operated by the military, gathering images as they traverse the planet.

Oded Erez

Imagesat, on the other hand, is a private corporation that sells images taken by its satellites to clients around the world. Many clients want the information contained in satellite images, but few can afford to actually launch and maintain one, he said.

Drones likewise can provide photographic imagery of sites, and the technology that goes into them has grown by leaps and bounds from the device's early years.

Erez, who began his involvement with UAVs (unmanned air vehicles) in 1970 and served as a unit commander and later as base commander of a drone unit, said Israel has been a leader in developing drones. It long ago adopted the philosophy that "even if the mission fails, you don't lose prisoners of war or leave widows behind," he said.

Drones are harder for enemies to locate, due to the composite, radar-evading materials that go into them. They're also quieter than other military aircraft, and their range is impressive. The United States recently tested one that flew nonstop from Los Angeles to Australia, a 36-hour flight in the air, he said.

With the introduction of GPS into drones, "You can make the bird fly precisely, like clockwork," he said

Israel markets its drones to clients such as India and Azerbaijan.

But, "in the defence business, you never sell your most up-to-date stuff," he said.

Gift gives Russian Jewish centre its own home

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — At 29, David Schottenstein is one of the most successful young entrepreneurs in the United States. His Columbus, Ohio-based custom clothing business, Astor & Black, reached annual sales of more than $20 million last year.

This online company, which he founded in 2004, has done so well that in March, the Massachusetts-based private investment company Castanea Partners announced it was making a major investment in Astor & Black, whose clients include corporate executives, professional athletes and other celebrities who appreciate the personal visits the company's clothiers make to their offices or homes for fittings.

Although the terms were not disclosed, Castanea says it invests between $15 million and $75 million in businesses it likes.

Schottenstein celebrated the windfall by making a $500,000 donation to the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Montreal, headed by Chabad Rabbi Israel Sirota.

Why? One reason is that Schottenstein's wife, Eda, is Rabbi Sirota's daughter. Schottenstein himself is a graduate of the Lubavitch Oholei Torah Rabbinical Seminary in New York City.

The donation has allowed the centre, which was founded by Rabbi Sirota almost 40 years ago soon after he immigrated to Montreal from the Soviet Union, to finally have a place of its own after moving around to a series of rented premises over the decades.

The new centre is located at 5380 Bourret Ave., the former Congregation Anshei Ozeroff, which most recently housed a Jewish school, Académie Taryag Arizal.

"Everyone is very excited about this, even those who are not so religious," said Mark Groysberg, head of the United Community of Russian-Speaking Jews of Quebec and publisher for 18 years of the Russian Jewish newspaper the Voice of the Community.

Based on government data, he thinks there are at least 20,000 Jews of Russian origin in Quebec, including a few in Sherbrooke and Quebec City, although many aren't formally affiliated with the Jewish community.

"Even if there is only half that, it is a very big number," said Groysberg, who immigrated from Ukraine in 1990. He believes the new centre will help bring more Russian Jews into community life.

An Open Letter: Stop Bill C-31 - Protect Canada's Refugees

In 1939, the Canadian government refused to allow the SS St. Louis ship to land in Canada. The SS St. Louis was carrying 937 desperate German refugees most of whom were Jewish. Many eventually perished in the Holocaust. Much has changed in Canada since 1939. However, there is now a Bill before Parliament that would create an historic backward shift in the way Canada responds to the needs of people seeking protection.

For 60 years, Canada has upheld the principles and respected the legal obligations of the 1951 Geneva Refugee Convention, in particular by not returning refugees to countries where they face serious threats to their lives or freedom.

For 60 years, Canada has also opened its doors in response to major international crises. In 1956-57, 38,000 Hungarian refugees came to Canada. In 1972, Canada welcomed 6,000 East Asian refugees from Uganda. In 1979, the Progressive Conservative government encouraged Canadians to privately sponsor Indochinese boat people. Over 60,000 refugees were resettled in Canada in 1979 and 1980. 34,000 were privately sponsored.

In 1986, the Canadian people collectively received the Nansen Award, in recognition of outstanding service to refugees. The award committee cited "the major and sustained contribution of the People of Canada to the cause of refugees" through individuals, families, voluntary agencies, community and religious organizations, as well as the three levels of government.

Bill C-31 would destroy this proud heritage. The arrivals of the Ocean Lady and the Sun Sea respectively carrying 76 and 492 Sri Lankan refugee claimants prompted the Canadian government to proclaim a "crisis" and to table a Bill that would destroy Canada's proud humanitarian tradition.

A postcard of the SS St. Louis, May 1939. United States Holocaust Memorial Museum (http://www.ushmm.org)

including minors. Innocent men, women, and youth - young and old, healthy and disabled - against whom there is no suspicion of any wrongdoing or risk, could languish in jail for months. This provision violates the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and international human rights law. Even if their claims are accepted, these refugees will be barred from applying for permanent residence for five years after the acceptance of their claims. This will prevent them from reuniting with children or spouses for many more years. Bill C-31 allows the Minister to curtail appeal rights for refugee claimants whom the minister deems "bogus" because they come from a list of designated countries, creating a discriminatory two-tiered system. Bill C-31 allows the government to jail any permanent resident entering Canada without charges, based on mere suspicion of criminality.

Bill C-31 imposes overly short timelines before refugee determination hearings, which will seriously disadvantage refugees who have experienced trauma such as torture or spousal violence, those who lack important documents, and those who need time to build trust to freely tell their story.

Our current law already contains many provisions for detaining people - if there is a risk or danger. Targeting people who are not suspected of wrongdoing and posing no risk will not stop human smuggling, nor is it a rational means of enhancing security. Tough measures, including life in prison for smugglers, already exist in our current law. Depriving people of a fair and adequate process and appeal will not help Canada determine who is or is not a "bogus" refugee. It will needlessly punish recognized refugees and their families, and it risks sending genuine refugees back to danger.

'We had to clean up the riffraff left behind'

Unsatisfied with that response, the young Bernd wanted to know what his father really did in the war, why he felt the way he did about Jews and why he said the Holocaust never happened.

Now 54, Wollschlaeger recalls arguing with his father about the Holocaust. After initially denying the Wehrmacht had anything to do with it, his father eventually said, "It had to happen. We had to clean up the riffraff left behind by others."

Wollschlaerger researched his father's tank unit and learned it had participated in at least one atrocity: it had used 200 human shields in an operation early in the war in which all the civilians were killed. What's more, his father commanded the unit involved.

"I was shocked that my father would adhere to a cold-blooded, life-denying ideology," Wollschlaeger said.

His curiosity about his father's attitude to Jews led him "to embark on a spiritual journey."

He sought out the tiny Jewish community in Bamberg, his hometown. "Through their eyes I wanted to experience Israel, experience the Jewish People and what the Holocaust meant for them," he said.

He was surprised that the Bamberg Jews "related to me in a normal way, even a friendly way… They accepted me as the Shabbes goy" – the gentile who performs certain tasks for them on the Sabbath.

His time with the Jews of Bamberg served as a sort of "spiritual retreat" from the conflict in his own home. They became his "family of choice."

He began accumulating Jewish paraphernalia such as kippot and books. His parents thought he had joined a cult. When his father took "a very aggressive stand, I told him I needed to find out why [he] hated them so much that [he was] willing to kill them."

His father's answer: "It was either them or us."

But Wollschlaeger could find nothing among the Jews that made him hate them. On the contrary, he found "the Jewish culture fascinating, [particularly] their adherence to their own culture and history, despite what had happened to them."

Wollschlaeger studied with a Frankfurt rabbi for two years, and in October 1986, he was converted by a rabbinical court. The conversion marked a total and final break from his father, who felt betrayed. "I never saw him again. He died six months later," Wollschlaerger said.

A few months after converting, Wollschlaeger obtained an Israeli visa and left for the Jewish state, without much advanced preparation. "I did goornicht (nothing)," he joked.

He spent six months in a kibbutz and took part in an absorption program. He worked in the banana orchards and studied Hebrew.

A physician in Germany, he later went through a one-year internship program to obtain his Israeli licence. He practised medicine at the Ichilov hospital and married an American Jewish woman. He served in the Israeli Defence Forces as a doctor for two years and raised his children as Jews.

In Israel, he felt accepted: "Once you join the tribe and are willing to defend the tribe in the army, you're one of them," he said.

They lived a normal Israeli life until the 1991 Gulf War, when Iraq fired missiles into Israel. It so unnerved his wife that she moved the family back to her native United States.

"I went, it was the only family I had, the only normal life I had," Wollschlaeger said.

A few years after moving to the United States, his family life fell apart and his wife, who only then learned of his real past, felt "betrayed," he said.

He remarried and had another child. His new wife and child accompanied him to Germany where Wollschlaeger sought closure. He visited his parents' graves, and in a remarkable chapter that closes his book, he notes that his mother, who had visited him in Israel, hinted that the family had hidden secrets. Could this be what his late sister had once suggested – that they had Jewish ancestors on their mother's side?

"Would that have explained my unstoppable quest for answers? Might that explain why I was attracted to the Jewish faith? Why I felt the spirit of the Jewish prayers in my heart and soul?" he asks.

As he leaves, he tells his mother, "You can be proud of me. I made it against all odds."

Ottawa gives $400,000 for Auschwitz upkeep

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper has pledged $400,000 to help the preserve the Auschwitz-Birkenau Memorial in Poland.

Harper made the announcement May 14 while hosting Polish Prime Minister Donald Tusk during his state visit to Ottawa.

The Auschwitz-Birkenau Foundation is a Polish non-governmental organization that's seeking to preserve the former Nazi concentration and extermination camp by raising 120 million euros ($154 million Cdn) to cover the site's conservation costs.

The foundation was created in January 2009 by Prof. Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, a former Auschwitz prisoner and current chairman of the Auschwitz Council.

In 2009 Tusk asked the heads of 40 countries to help cover the costs of maintaining the site. Last week's grant fulfils Harper's pledge to contribute.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper, right, with Polish PM Donald Tusk

The funds will come from the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade's budget.

"Canada's support for the memorial site will help with the conservation of the buildings, grounds, and the thousands of historical objects that are endangered by erosion and deterioration," the prime minister's office said.

The memorial comprises almost 200 hectares, and includes 155 buildings, 300 ruins, including those of the gas chambers and crematoria, as well as more than 100,000 personal items that belonged to the people who were killed, along with archival documents and prisoners' artworks.

Canadian Jewish community leaders and representatives of survivors' groups praised the announcement.

In a joint statement, David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, and Hank Rosenbaum, co-president of the Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors and Descendants organization, lauded the government's gift.

"Auschwitz-Birkenau serves as a stark reminder of the depths of evil the Jewish people, and indeed the entire world, faced in recent history," Rosenbaum said. "[The government's] commitment is a tribute to the survivors who overcame these horrors, rebuilding their shattered lives and contributing so much to Canadian society in the years that followed."

Frank Dimant, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada, said the grant is important, because it's "critical for future generations to bear witness against Holocaust deniers."

On its website, the Auschwitz-Birkenau Foundation states that unless enough funding is found, much of its buildings and surroundings will go to ruin.

"[T]he clock is running faster and faster. If we do not find a way today to underwrite a comprehensive plan for conservation on a permanent basis, we will never manage to catch up with the natural erosion and deterioration of many buildings and other objects," said foundation president and museum director Piotr M. A. Cywinski.

"Until now, the entire burden of maintaining this place has fallen on Poland, which will continue to finance the ongoing operation of the museum."

Canada follows numerous other countries that have given aid to the NGO, including Israel ($1 million in 2011), the United States ($15 million in 2010), the Netherlands ($400,000 in 2011), Poland (10 million euros in 2011), Austria ($6 million in 2010), and Germany (60 million euros in 2009).

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

" אינני מבין את ידידי שמתנגדים להקמת מסגד נוסף בטורונטו. לדעתי כל אזרח קנדי צריך לעודד לסובלנות ללא הבדל דת או גזע!
אבל שישאר בינינו.

תרומת בת מצווה

Ride 2 Remember raising funds for Holocaust Educators Study Tour

Eighth annual event revs up on June 1st

By Daniel Horowitz

It's long been believed that education is the most valuable tool at our disposal in order to ensure that humanity is not doomed to repeat its mistakes. When it comes to the Holocaust, teaching the next generation about hatred, intolerance, and antisemitism is vital.

Fortunately for all of us, the members of the Jewish Motorcyclists Alliance (JMA) share that sentiment.

The JMA, which will be holding its 8th annual - and first Canadian – Ride 2 Remember (R2R) in Toronto on June 1, 2012, has chosen the Holocaust Educators Study Tour – which is perfectly aligned with its philosophy - as the recipient of its fundraising efforts.

Every R2R, which is dedicated to the six million Jews who lost their lives during the Holocaust, is an annual fundraising initiative with the goal of funding Holocaust education at local community centers, schools, museums, universities and colleges throughout the world.

Under the auspices of UJA Federation's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, this year's fundraising recipient, the Holocaust Educators' Study Tour, sends non-Jewish Canadian educators to Europe to visit sites of historical Jewish importance, including Auschwitz-Birkenau and Oskar Shindler's factory, where they learn about the Holocaust in a meaningful and in-depth manner. The group is led by professional Holocaust educators and, when possible, a Holocaust survivor.

These encounters are supplemented with pedagogical methods and expertise to enable participants to teach about the Holocaust in new ways upon returning to their classrooms.

The 8th Annual Ride to Remember take to the streets of Toronto on June 1st

"When I was first apprised of the Holocaust Educators Tour, which is only made available when there is funding available, I knew that it was the perfect project for us to support," said Stephen Stein, Chair, 2012 Ride to Remember Organizing Committee. "To teach non-Jewish educators - many of whom teach in places where Jewish students are few and far between - about the Holocaust, is invaluable, and was very appealing to us. Our fundraising goal is to raise enough money to send at least 40 educators to Europe."

"It is so meaningful that the Ride to Remember has designated the Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre as its recipient," says Mira Goldfarb, Executive Director, the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre. "Their support will allow us to continue to engage teachers across Canada in learning about the Holocaust and Jewish heritage with a most profound and life changing experience. Our Educators' Study Tour not only prepares teachers, but also honours our survivor speakers who have given so generously of their time, sharing their experiences both of loss and resilience in the Holocaust. Teaching teachers has a 'multiplier effect,' and this is especially gratifying both for the survivors and our organizational leadership."

The day prior to the Ride 2 Remember, JMA riders will come together in Ottawa where they will be holding a joint "Never Again" pledge, on Parliament Hill.

If you want to see the riders off on June 1st, they will be leaving the parking lot of Thornhill's Shaar Shalom Synagogue at approximately 9:30 am, before heading south on the 404 to the CNE grounds. They return north along University Avenue before ending their ride at Holy Blossom Temple for a luncheon and brief ceremony.

For more information, or to make a donation to the JMA's Ride 2 Remember, visit holocaustcentre.com/Educators-Students/Educator-Study-Tour.

Legacy of Life: Faye Mintz z"l

Born and raised in Toronto, Faye Mintz (nee Ulster) grew up in a traditional and warm Jewish home, thanks to her father (a rabbi), her mother, and her three siblings. She dreamed of becoming a kindergarten teacher; however when her father died when she was just 13 years old, she and her siblings took on the responsibility of supporting the family.

Our mother met our father, Al Mintz, while working as a bookkeeper where he was an accountant. Thus began a love affair that spanned more than 60 years and produced five children and 13 grandchildren.

Faye's life was governed by her all-encompassing love of family. Our hearts are warmed by memories of Friday night dinners, where we would gather around the Shabbos table for a delicious meal. While we laughed at our father's jokes, complained about our siblings, and tried to speak over each other, our mother just sat and kvelled at her lot. She was happiest, however, during the summers at our cottage in Belle Ewart, where she was surrounded by not only our family, but by her siblings, nieces and nephews.

Faye enjoyed socializing with her many friends, knitting, playing maj and bridge, and travelling. Of all the countries she visited, none could compare to Israel, which reinforced her Jewish ideals and traditions. She loved how Israelis grabbed hold of life. And, she tried to live her life that way, even in her later years, when illness made things difficult for her.

Irwin and Faye Mintz

Our mother believed in tikkun olam, and every Monday for more than 20 years, she donned her pink smock and volunteered at Baycrest. Her love of Baycrest led her and my father to establish an endowment to help fund research into aging. She was also involved with Reena, and the Al and Faye Mintz Reena Elderhome stands as testament to her desire to give back to the community.

As a committed UJA donor, Faye chose to support the Lebovic and Prosserman centres through our family foundation, and to endow her Lion of Judah so that she could provide a Jewish legacy in perpetuity.

Faye's goodness and kindness continue to reverberate in the community, but her personal legacy lives on in the sense of yiddishkeit, values and integrity she instilled in her children and grandchildren. We hope to carry on her commitment to the Jewish community and beyond in a way that would make her proud.

Six Days plus 45 years, Pt. 1

Forty-five years ago, Israel and its neighbours fought a war that set into motion events that are still felt today. Although the Six Day War is well documented, the web presents us with the ability to reread the same breaking news that gripped the world in June 1967.

This sampling of stories is not intended to be comprehensive history. Rather, it illustrates the gamut of emotions felt during that war and foreshadows the conflict that remains today.

June 4: War could be hours away

From the Sydney Sun-Herald: The British prime minister, Mr. Wilson, yesterday warned that war could be only hours away. And, in Tel Aviv, today, the new Israeli defence minister, Gen. Moshe Dayan, declared that Israel would fight and win its own battles, with Israeli troops. [http://bit.ly/6day39]

June 5: War in Mideast – Arab-Israel feud erupts

JERUSALEM (AP) – For the third time in 20 years, war broke out today in the Middle East between Israel and its Arab neighbours. Gunfire sounded in Israel and in three of its Arab neighbours – Egypt, Jordan and Syria. The Arabs, sworn to destroy Israel, were battling the Jewish state's forces on two fronts, at Egypt's Sinai frontier and on the Syria and Jordan borders. Each side accused the other of lighting the fuse for the explosion which, as in 1956, threatened to involve the major powers. [http://bit.ly/6day23]

Finding a new Shavuot ritual

It's easy to forget about Shavuot.

The holiday comes at the end of the school year, with the rush of final exams and the start of little league. It's clustered with other celebrations, such as Mother's Day and Yom Ha'atzmaut, graduation and the beginning of camp. The foods of the holiday – generic dairy – pale in comparison to the unique symbols and memories of apples and honey, jelly donuts, hamentashen and matzah.

But most of all, unlike other holidays with their unique rituals such as sitting in the sukkah, lighting Chanukah candles, or a seder, Shavuot's custom of all night learning is lacklustre. For reasons of scheduling and interest, it's able to capture the imagination of only a small demographic.

The nexus of these factors leads Shavuot to be one of the least celebrated of the Jewish holidays.

Because of the lack of compelling ritual, my celebration of Shavuot has changed through my stages of life.

As a child, Shavuot was marked by end-of-the-year ceremonies in synagogue. Junior congregation was invited into the sanctuary, and the youth leaders announced our names and gave us a Jewishly oriented children's book as a capstone to the year. The ceremony was a wonderful way to mark the end of the year and a great pull for "regulars." But it was an insiders' event, honouring those who were already engaged in synagogue life.

In high school it was cool to stay up all night – at least among my very limited group of friends. We would gather at one synagogue, eat a lot of ice cream, learn a little Torah and fall asleep on the couches. As a day school student with no classes the next day and parents committed to the endeavour, it was easy for me to participate. Few of my peers in the throes of exams showed up.

Class Act

Daniel Held

During university, I was on summer vacation by the time Shavuot rolled around. Some years, I was traveling and experienced Shavuot with a local Jewish community. Other years, the holiday presented a pause from a summer job. Unlike the High Holidays or Pesach, Shavuot doesn't have a gravitational pull that brings students home for the holiday.

Last year, for the first time, I attended a Shavuot retreat. A growing number of synagogues and independent minyanim organize such programs combining Torah learning, tfillot and recreational activities.

They're slightly different in each community. They take the form of multi-day immersive experiences at camps or shorter programs in parks and other natural sites, with programs for a specific age group or events that cross generations.

In the spring months, Shavuot retreats capitalize on the opportunity to spent time in budding nature and a relaxed environment to study Torah and build community.

Shavuot retreats offer a potential new ritual that can cross the gamut of life's stages and rejuvenate the celebration of Shavuot. From young children and their families to high school and university students to empty nesters, Shavuot retreats offer the opportunity to bridge the holiday's two parallel themes of Torah study and celebrating the first fruits of nature while engaging participants in memorable experience that will draw them back year after year.

Rights body had become anti-Israel

David Matas

Guest Voice

I welcome the call of MP Irwin Cotler, the Liberal critic for justice and human rights, for an alternative mechanism to replace the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, known as Rights and Democracy ("Cotler slams decision to shutter rights agency," April 19). There is a need for a mechanism to co-ordinate various government rights and democracy initiatives abroad.

Whatever one thinks of the value of external criticism of democratic countries with independent judiciaries and free media, Rights and Democracy, when it came to Israel, went far beyond that. Rights and Democracy had joined the anti-Zionist pack.

Attempts by the board to assert accountability and transparency led to staff rebellion and a self-serving false narrative. That narrative has now assumed the status of urban legend, which, regrettably, is repeated in The CJN article, written by Janice Arnold.

The article states that former president, Rémy Beauregard, died of a heart attack the night after a particularly acrimonious board meeting. I was at the board meeting, and it was not acrimonious.

The article states that Rights and Democracy was an arm's length organization financed only 80 per cent by the government of Canada. In fact, it was financed 100 per cent by the government of Canada.

The article states the organization's chair, Aurel Braun, objected to three grants given to organizations to monitor human rights in the aftermath of the Gaza war of 2008-09. These grants were used to finance work that became the basis of the Goldstone report (in which it was stated that Israel had intentionally killed Palestinian civilians during the Gaza war), work Goldstone himself later rejected. It is misleading to call them grants to monitor human rights. Moreover, at the time the grants were decided, the reputation of all three beneficiaries was known. Al-Haq and Al Mezan as leading proponents of anti-Israel lawfare and key advocates of boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel, and B'Tselem, as engaged in methodologically tendentious research against Israel.

The CJN article refers to the heart of the dispute as being about differing views on the Arab-Israeli conflict. Yet, the demonization and delegitimization of Israel are more than just a view on the Arab-Israel conflict. They are a view on human rights, whether the Jewish People are to be treated equally with the rest of the peoples of this world to a right to self-determination.

The three grants were one of a litany of rogue activities. To give but one other example, staff of Rights and Democracy worked on Durban II, the 2009 United Nations anti-racism conference in which Israel was targeted. The government of Canada, to its credit, decided to boycott Durban II. Beauregard, when asked at a parliamentary committee whether Rights and Democracy had participated either directly or indirectly in Durban II misled Parliament by stating that it had not.

Repeated board member requests to the agency for the relevant staff reports were unsuccessful. Only independent investigative work, including an effort by Ottawa Citizen columnist Terry Glavin, produced them.

The CJN article is unfair to both Cotler and Braun by suggesting that they hold opposing views when, to my knowledge, they coincide. I was a member of the board not just recently, when Braun was its chair, but earlier when Cotler was its acting chair. When Cotler was acting chair, we decided to close down the Middle East program at Rights and Democracy to avoid a continuation of the problems that had then started to arise.

The Jewish community has seen at the UN Human Rights Commission and the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva how quickly and easily human rights institutions become instead anti-Zionist institutions. When we build the alternative mechanism that Cotler and Braun both want, we have to ensure that the mechanism actually respects rights and democracy.

Let's rejoice in our Torah this holiday

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Through years of experience, I have come to realize that Jews seem not to attach the same importance to Shavuot as they do to the other yamim tovim.

Both Pesach and Sukkot have an abundance of rituals that every Jew begins to learn at an early age. On Pesach, we eat matzah and have a seder, and on Sukkot, we sit in a sukkah and shake the lulav. Yet on Shavuot, it seems as if there's nothing "fun" to do. Why is this so?

As we all know, Shavuot commemorates God's giving the Torah to us, His Chosen People. This unique event was of such importance that He didn't want us to be distracted by any rituals whatsoever, so that we may devote all of our attention to this special gift.

The giving of the Torah was so crucial to the world that the first Rashi of the Torah says that the word bereshit (in the beginning) means bishvil reshit (for the sake of the beginning). The word reshit alludes to the Torah. What Rashi is saying is that if the Torah would not have been given, the world would not exist.

There is more, however, regarding the meaning of Shavuot, the Festival of Weeks, which is revealed by examining the timing of the holiday. More precisely, why are we given "seven weeks" without specifying a calendar date?

With enormous ramifications, God was setting the stage for all time when He gave the Torah Sheh B'al Peh (the Oral Torah), which provides, in fact, the justification for rabbinical interpretation of the Torah Sheh B'chtav (the Written Torah). Not only did God say to the sages of history, "You figure out the calendar date of Shavuot," but He was also saying for posterity that, when questions about the Written Torah arise, Jews are to turn to the rabbis, who hereby have the authority to elucidate such questions.

In the same vein, on Shavuot we read the Book of Ruth. As we know, Ruth was a convert who came from the nation of Moab. Yet, according to our Written Torah, the Moabite is not to become a member of the Jewish Nation (Dvarim, 23:4). Thus, when the legitimacy of Ruth's conversion was questioned at the time of the ascendance to kingship of David (Ruth's great-grandson), the sages determined (Yevamot 77a), with the authority of the Talmud (the Torah Sheh B'al Peh) that we have just discussed, that the exclusion of the Moabites referred to men but not women.

On this and every Shavuot, let us not feel bereft of rituals, but, rather, heartened by our tradition of the all-night study, during which we review and contemplate our lives in light of our two Torahs – written and oral – that have guided us always.

WJC president meets Harper in Ottawa

ndy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The president of the World Jewish Congress (WJC) met with Prime Minister Stephen Harper in Ottawa last week to discuss rising global levels of antisemitism and anti-Zionism and to suggest ways to continue pressuring Iran on its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Ronald Lauder was in Ottawa on May 16 on a visit to Parliament Hill hosted by members of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). He also lunched with Foreign Minister John Baird.

Lauder has met with Harper before, hosting the prime minister at his New York home last fall as part of the WJC's acknowledgement of Canada's support for Israel and other Jewish causes, he said.

He said Canada has taken a greater leadership role in the international community with respect to the Middle East, Iran and the support of Israel, and he was in Canada to offer the WJC's support and counsel to the government on issues relating to the Middle East and antisemitism.

Ron Lauder

Speaking to The CJN from Ottawa, Lauder, an American businessman and philanthropist – listed by Forbes in 2011 as one of the richest people of the world, with an estimated net worth of $3.3 billion – said he was in Canada because of Harper's strong support for Israel and to "formalize" relations between the WJC and CIJA.

Asked what specifically he spoke to Baird and Harper about, Lauder said he briefed them "on some of my travels and some of the major issues facing Jews today, not only in Israel but also around the world."

His travels have recently taken him to Turkey, France, Italy and Israel.

"There are major issues facing world Jewry," he said. "Frankly, Canada has been an outspoken supporter of Israel, and this trip was a way to say 'thank you' and also brief [Harper] on what's happening to world Jewry."

Lauder also said he gave the prime minister his opinion on how the new Israeli coalition government could affect the peace process with the Palestinians.

The spectre of renewed, virulent antisemitism as a result of the world economic downturn was also on the agenda.

"Whenever there are financial problems, you do see the rise of antisemitism. And you can tie that back to Iran. Whatever happens, there will be an effect on oil prices, which in turn will have an [economic] effect on the rest of the world. And the question is: what can be done?" Lauder said.

As to his dealings with CIJA – which replaced the now-defunct Canadian Jewish Congress, the WJC's longtime Canadian affiliate – Lauder said the Canadian Jewish community is "strong and very self-sufficient."

Shimon Fogel, CIJA's CEO, said his organization wants to solidify its relationship with the WJC, because the world body's "extensive network" has a lot to offer to Canadian Jews.

Fogel also said that with the convergence of issues affecting Jews worldwide, co-ordination between the WJC and CIJA makes sense.

"It allows us to leverage WJC to support the work we do [in Canada]," he said.

He said the WJC also recently started giving money and resources to CIJA for its advocacy work in Canada and abroad.

Fogel wouldn't reveal how much assistance the WJC has given CIJA, but he said it's been enough to start planning more trips to Israel for MPs and senators, and to promote CIJA's anti-boycott movement, for example.

"These things cost real money. And his help is a huge boost to CIJA's capacity to deliver to our constituency," Fogel said.

Lauder confirmed that the WJC and CIJA are working on joint initiatives regarding antisemitism or anti-Zionism.

"We have interesting plans, but we're not yet ready to discuss them. Part of the reason I'm here is to understand what Canada needs and what [the WJC] can give and then put the pieces together."

He added: "We're also talking about 70 or 80 countries working together on these efforts. It's a difficult world out there, and it could become more so [for Israel and Jews] in the coming years."

Aboriginal leader looks to Israel as role model

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Two years ago, Ron Evans, the former grand chief of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs and the current chief of Norway House Cree Nation in northern Manitoba, visited Israel for the first time.

Although he had to cut his trip short after just three days because of a family emergency, Evans was inspired by what he saw: "In Israel, I saw such a young country that has come so far in just a few years," he said.

"The Jewish People are an ancient people who have overcome tremendous adversity and have become very successful. They have been able to maintain their culture and heritage while, at the same time, embracing the modern world. Our youth have much to learn from that."

Evans was determined to share his Israel experience with his community. To that end, in co-operation with the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, he organized a Young Leadership Mission to Israel from Norway House, a community of about 5,000 to 6,000 people 456 kilometres by air north of Winnipeg.

"This is the first mission to Israel of this kind in Canada," said Shelley Faintuch, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's community relations director and local director of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, who helped plan the itinerary and accompanied the group of 30 young people from Norway House and a band councillor on the trip to Israel. They left on April 29.

Chief Ron Evans

"The focus of the mission was on leadership development," Faintuch said. "The goals were to teach these young people – through seeing the example of Israel – to take responsibility for developing programs and initiatives in their community.

"Even though this was supposed to be an educational program rather than just a tour, we showed them Israel from top to bottom."

For most of the young people, and possibly all of them, this was the first time they had ever been overseas, Faintuch said. Their first stop in Israel was at Better Place, the company behind Israel's first electric car manufacturer.

"We wanted to show that Israelis and aboriginal peoples share a sense of responsibility for taking care of the earth," she said.

The mission participants saw Israel in all of its religious and ethnic diversity. Among the people they met were young Israeli leaders in the north; Druze villagers; an Ethiopian-born Israeli police officer; David Weinberg, Israel office director of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs; and Bassam Eid, the longtime director of the Palestine Human Rights Monitoring Group.

The aboriginal youths ate at an Arab restaurant, stood on the border near Lebanon, stuffed papers in the cracks in the wall at the Kotel, participated in an archeological dig and learned something of the long history of the Jewish People, visited the former British detention camp at Atlit, stood on Masada and absorbed the atmosphere of Yad Vashem.

"Yad Vashem was a very emotional experience for the group members," Faintuch said. "One individual said that he never really understood the Jewish People until visiting Yad Vashem."

For recreation, Faintuch noted, the visitors were taken rafting and to the ice rink at Metullah, where they did some skating and helped some of the Israeli skaters.

The Christian part of the tour included visits to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Garden of Gethsemane and Christian holy sites around the Sea of Galilee.

A special moment for Faintuch was when her son, Zev, met the young Canadians in Jerusalem and showed the visitors some of Jerusalem's nightlife. He also spoke to them about his decision to come to Israel and volunteer to serve in the Israeli Army.

The group returned to Winnipeg on May 6.

"The highlight of this mission for me," Evans said, "was in seeing the changes in our young people on a daily basis. They were in awe of Israel and all the places we visited. Everyone in our group wants to go back to Israel."

Evans said he is planning to take a group of potential young leaders from his community to Israel every year for the next nine years and more.

"We have already started our fundraising for our mission next spring," he said.

Hillel International CEO visits Toronto

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Hillel of Greater Toronto's annual general meeting on May 16 featured a special guest. Wayne Firestone, president and CEO of Hillel International, came from the United States to congratulate Toronto's Hillel on its recent growth and success.

"This is a different Hillel than the one that many of us encountered when we were in college or when our parents were in college," said Firestone, who has been involved with Hillel since he was an undergraduate student at the University of Miami.

He explained that Hillel has been engaging many more Jewish students and growing worldwide, building 25 new facilities in North America in the last five years.

The AGM, held at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, marked the transition between the outgoing chair of the board of Hillel of Greater Toronto, Lindy Goodman, and the incoming chair, Shelly Feld. Firestone presented Goodman with the prestigious Exemplar of Excellence Award for her outstanding work and devotion as chair.

Feld thanked both Goodman and executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto Zac Kaye for their leadership, and spoke of his excitement at taking on his new role, continuing his family's tradition of strong involvement in the Jewish community.

He added that in recent years, as Toronto's Hillel has made an effort to connect with more Jewish students on campus, there has been new understanding of what's important to students and how to attract them. "We have found that it's not about planning programs to bring the students to us, but it's about reaching out," he said.

Wayne Firestone

Three students who were actively involved in some of the Hillel outreach initiatives over the last year shared stories of their experiences. Allysa Moses, who just completed her studies at the University of Toronto, was one of the Campus Entrepreneur Interns. She and the other interns were responsible for engaging previously uninvolved Jewish students on campus, and they reached about 640 new students in the last year.

"The interactions that I had with each student opened my eyes to the diversity of the Jewish community," Moses said, adding that, through her internship she learned the importance of "being interested, not interesting," or listening to others rather than talking.

Moses was joined at the podium by Eyal Melamed, who just completed his studies at York University, as well as Isaac Kates Rose, who completed his studies at U of T. Melamed helped develop the new Pisga initiative to connect with Israeli and Russian-Israeli students, and Kates Rose was an Ask Big Questions fellow, working to engage students in a more communicative campus environment through asking interesting, and sometimes difficult, questions about life, Judaism and the Middle East.

Firestone, who became president of Hillel International in 2006, feels that it is exactly this kind of outreach to the Jewish community on campus that will bring Hillel the success it is seeking. As part of a five-year strategic plan, Hillel plans to reach out to and maintain contact with 70 per cent of Jewish students on all campuses, up from a current 45 per cent active involvement rate, based on American data.

The number of students involved with Hillel in the United States is already up about 36 per cent since 2005, according to Hillel's research, and Firestone is optimistic that they will continue to grow. "We indeed are going to be the meshugeneh organization that actually takes the risks that are necessary to advance Jewish life," he said of the importance of continuing to expand outreach programs like those at Toronto's Hillel.

Firestone presented data showing the importance of Hillel as a formative experience in the lives of most Jewish community leaders, adding that the campus is the best place to get young Jews involved in an enduring commitment to their communities.

"There is actually a love affair going on between Jews and higher education," he said.

It's this involvement with Hillel and the greater Jewish community in young adulthood that will facilitate the growth of community leaders and a strong overall Jewish community in the future, he said. Attracting intelligent, thoughtful and inquisitive young people is imperative.

"We are actually a strategy for the Jewish People."

Shavuot – when vegetarian cooks are in the limelight

Dorothy Lipovenko
Special to The CJN

What's not to love about Shavuot? No fasting, no month-long housecleaning that leaves you collapsed like a cheap umbrella in the wind, nothing essential to the celebration that can be spoiled by rain or snow.

Shavuot asks so little but gives so much in return, especially its twin customs that reflect the best in domestic pursuits: home decor and cooking. It's easy to love a holiday where cheesecake stars at the table, and flowers or other greenery appear in our homes for a command performance, to reprise what is believed to have been their role at Mount Sinai when the Torah was handed down.

Shavuot is also the time when vegetarian cooks get to shine. The festival's customary consumption of dairy foods is a showcase for our year-round culinary and dietary preferences.

DILLY LOX QUICHE

This dish pays homage to "necessity is the mother of invention." On discovering key ingredients missing for a quiche an hour before guests were due, I made some fast substitutions that yielded this simple, delicious pie. It's higher in fat and sodium than we usually eat, so this is served strictly for guests/holidays only.

1 unbaked 9-inch pie shell
6 large eggs (discard three yolks)
1/2 of a 100-gram package of lox or smoked salmon, cut into small pieces
2/3 cup chopped red or yellow onion
2 tbsp. milk
3 tbsp. soft herbed cream cheese
6 medium white button mushrooms, sliced thin
1 tbsp. (well-packed) snipped fresh dill (well-washed)
pinch each black pepper and Italian seasoning
1 medium red potato, peeled, sliced thin and cooked until tender-crisp

Partially thaw the pie crust, prick the bottom in a few spots and bake at 325 until slightly browned. Remove from oven and set aside to cool.

In a small skillet on low heat, briefly sauté the mushrooms in two teaspoons of water. Remove from heat and spread on bottom of pie crust.

In the same skillet, sauté onion on low heat in two tablespoons of water until softened, stirring occasionally to avoid sticking. Add fish pieces just before onion is done, stir for a minute and remove from heat.

Beat eggs, milk, cream cheese, pepper and Italian seasoning with a wire whisk in a mixing bowl until well blended. (If using a processor or blender, pour combined mixture into a bowl). Stir in dill and onion/lox and pour into the pie crust. Arrange potato slices on top and dust very lightly with paprika for colour. Bake 40-45 minutes at 350, until firm and set.
Serve immediately with spinach salad and/or Israeli salad. Serves four.

PINDJUR CHICKPEA SALAD

I recently discovered the magic of pindjur, a tomato/eggplant relish available in jars. It can be high in sodium, so I use it sparingly, just a tablespoon or two in roasted eggplant spread, pasta sauce and even atop pizza. On a whim, I turned to pindjur to jazz up a chickpea salad, and it's now a dinner table regular or cold appetizer for Shabbat lunch in summer. Among the kosher brands of pindjur available, I use Melis, available in 10.5-oz. jars.

1 19-ounce can chickpeas
1 large tomato, diced, or 12 small cherry tomatos, halved
1 small red bell pepper, seeded and chopped
1 cup peeled and diced English or Kirby cucumber
1-1/2 tbsp. finely diced red onion
2 generous tbsp. pindjur
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
3/4 tsp. ground cumin
1/2 tsp. garlic powder
black pepper

Drain chickpeas in a colander, rinse well under cool running water and drain well. Place chickpeas, tomato, red pepper, cucumber, onion and pindjur in a serving bowl and toss lightly. Sprinkle spices, lemon juice and a generous pinch of black paper on the salad and toss again. Adjust seasonings to your taste. (I'm more generous with the pepper).

Refrigerate until ready to use, either cold or at room temperature. Enjoy with crusty bread, challah or pita, and slices of avocado and hearts of palm on the side. Serves four as an appetizer, two as a main course.

As the luminous digital numbers counted down to zero, the already frenetic activity on stage intensified. Hands deftly flitted from frying pan to plate, from sieve to saucer. The staccato chop-chop beat of knife on board, the hazy helixes of steam rising under the spotlights, the taunting aromas of seasonings and spices, of sauces and sautées, were a symphony to the senses.

Lower fat choices key to good health

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

The parents of the baby boomer generation had the right idea: serve a glass of milk at most meals, instead of pop or juice. Dairy products are necessary in our nutritional regime because they are so rich in nutrients including calcium, potassium, protein and vitamin D. There are many ways to incorporate dairy into our daily diet.

First, consider that along with all the benefits of dairy foods, there is one drawback – fat. The good news is that there are now many low-fat or no-fat dairy choices on the market. When you do your weekly groceries, include low-fat milk, yogurt and cottage cheese, and reduced fat cream and hard cheeses. While planning meals, consider adding some different ingredients to your dairy purchases. A variety of fruits, cereals, peanut butter or nuts can be put into yogurt or smoothies.

Using other ingredients from your pantry or refrigerator along with dairy products will also help you create wonderful muffins and cakes. Additionally, adding dairy to your savoury dishes will inspire you to fashion wonderful main courses including quiches, pastas, puddings and soups.

Breakfast has traditionally been the meal when dairy foods are served. We often enjoy dairy foods at lunchtime as well. So why not marry the two and consider planning a brunch, either as an excuse for a family get together or for a special occasion or holiday. Shavuot, when dairy foods are traditionally served, is the perfect time.

LEMON POPPY SEED PANCAKES WITH STRAWBERRY SAUCE

Like the popular lemon poppy seed loaf, these fluffy pancakes will fly off the table. Consider doubling the recipe, so there will be enough for seconds.

1-1/4 cups skim milk
1 egg, beaten
zest of one lemon, zest removed with a microplane, or chopped very fine
1 tsp. pure lemon extract
2 tbsp. melted butter
additional butter or oil to brush onto the skillet or griddle
1-1/4 cups all-purpose flour
2 tbsp. sugar
2 tbsp. poppy seeds
2 -1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt

In a small bowl, combine skim milk, egg, lemon zest, lemon extract and 2 tablespoons melted butter until blended.

In a large bowl whisk together flour, sugar, poppy seeds, baking powder and salt. Gradually combine the wet mixture into the dry ingredients.

Brush skillet or griddle with melted butter. Heat to medium-high. Using 1/4 cup measure of batter for each pancake, pour batter into the pan about 2 to 3 inches apart. Cook the pancakes until the edges brown and the pancakes begin to bubble. Carefully turn the pancakes over and continue cooking until they are golden. Serve immediately. Serves 4.

Strawberry Sauce
2 cups strawberries, washed, hulled and sliced in half
1/4 cup water
1/4 cup sugar
zest of one lemon, zest removed with a microplane, or chopped very fine
1 tbsp. cornstarch mixed with 2 tbsp. water

Combine strawberries, water, sugar and lemon zest in a small saucepan. Place over medium heat and cook until strawberries are soft, about 4 to 5 minutes.

Add cornstarch mixture to strawberries. Stir until sauce begins to bubble and thicken. Remove from heat. Serve warm or at room temperature. You can make the sauce the day before and refrigerate.

Nuclear talks with Iran termed 'ridiculous'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Talks between Iran and world powers that end in agreed-upon measures that would nonetheless allow Tehran to continue and pursue military aspects of its nuclear program are "ridiculous," Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said last week.

Barak's comments, made in an interview with CNN's Piers Morgan, came ahead of this week's round of talks between Iran and representatives of the five permanent members of the UN Security Council plus Germany (known as P5+1), due to take place in the Iraqi capital of Baghdad.

Referring to the talks, Barak indicated that while Israel trusts the "United States and other members of the P5+1," it expects them "to set the bar at a place where it becomes clear that at least... it blocks Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons."

He added: "If the world community set the threshold that even if fully accepted, let alone only partially accepted by the Iranians, to keep moving toward a nuclear military program, that's ridiculous, a delusion."

As to Israel's desired result in the upcoming talks, Barak said: "There is a need to stop enriching uranium, to 20 per cent, or even three to five per cent, and to take all the enriched uranium out of the country. You can allow them to play with some negligible amount that will never suffice for even one single weapon."

Ehud Barak

When asked whether or not Iran was in the category of nations against which military actions must be taken – similar to attacks on reactors in Iraq and Syria – Barak said: "I cannot improve your description, it was so close to perfect. I think that the real challenges now are these negotiations, what should be done about the negotiations."

Tehran's bid to gain nuclear weapons capability is "a real challenge to the whole world, not just to Israel," Barak added.

"I think a nuclear Iran will change the whole landscape of the Middle East. We have to do something to block it from happening – through sanctions or negotiations or [anything] else," he said.

Last week, the RAND Corporation, a think-tank that advises the Pentagon, warned against an Israeli or American attack on Iran's nuclear reactors and recommended that the Obama administration try to "quietly influence the internal Israeli discussion over the use of military force."

In a document published in the think tank's periodical, the RAND Review, RAND openly disagreed with stance of Barak and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who favour an attack on Iran and were set to meet with U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta and other high-ranking officials this month.

Without naming names, RAND sided with former Mossad chief Meir Dagan and the former head of the Shin Bet, Yuval Diskin, who have publicly questioned the idea.

An overwhelming majority in the U.S. House of Representatives passed a resolution rejecting containment of Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program, but a sponsor made clear that the bill did not authorize use of force.

The non-binding resolution, which also says it is in the U.S. "vital interest" to keep Iran from achieving a nuclear capability, passed 401-11 on Thursday, and a similar resolution is under consideration in the Senate.

South Sudanese, Israel have common adversary

With Sudan having often served as a safe haven for enemies of Israel and the West, the South Sudanese and Israel have had a common adversary.

In the mid-1990s, Osama bin Laden found shelter in Sudan. In 1995, Sudanese intelligence agents participated in an attempt to assassinate then-Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak, an ally of Israel and the West. Khartoum signed a military co-operation agreement with Iran in 2008, and in 2009, Israeli warplanes reportedly bombed a 23-truck weapons convoy in Sudan bound for the Gaza Strip.

The first contact between militants from southern Sudan and the Israeli government was in 1967, when a commander with the Anyana Sudanese rebel movement wrote to then-Israeli prime minister Levi Eshkol. The officer explained that his militants were fighting on Sudan's southern flank, and that with some help, the Anyana could keep Israel's enemies bogged down and distracted.

According to James Mulla, the director of Voices of Sudan, a coalition of U.S.-based Sudanese-interest organizations, Israel's support proved pivotal to the Anyana's success during the first Sudanese civil war, which ended in 1972.

Israel "provided advisers to the Anyana, which is one reason why the government of Sudan wanted to sign a peace agreement," Mulla told JTA.

Over the years, there have been reports of the Israelis continuing to aid South Sudanese rebels during Sudan's second civil war, which lasted from 1983 to 2005.

Angelos Agok, a U.S.-based activist and a 13-year veteran in the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement, recalls that the SPLM's ties to Israel were kept discreet.

"It was an intricate case, where South Sudan was still part of Sudan, which is an Arab country," Agok said. "We didn't want to offend them, and we had to be very careful diplomatically."

Agok said SPLA leaders travelled to Israel for training. The Israeli government declined to comment on the subject.

Koren says the relationship with South Sudan is consistent with Israel's strategic interests in East Africa, where state failure and political extremism have provided terrorist groups with potential bases of operation.

"In the long run, we're expecting that friendly countries like South Sudan could be an ally like other states that are built in a non-extreme way," he said.

Agriculture is another reason for the alliance. South Sudan's economic future likely depends on large-scale farming. There was little commercial development in the region during the war years, and the country still imports much of its food from Uganda, despite sitting on some of Africa's richest potential farmland.

It's an area in which Israel has deep expertise. "We have the initiative and we have the abilities to contribute and to help," Koren said of South Sudan's agricultural potential.

Israel already has a small presence in the country in the form of IsraAid, an Israeli NGO coalition. In March, an IsraAid delegation helped South Sudan set up its ministry of social development, which will provide social-work-related services to a population traumatized by decades of war.

Eliseo Neuman, who is the director of the American Jewish Committee's Africa Institute and travelled to Juba with the SPLM when South Sudan was under Khartoum's control, says the close ties between Israel and South Sudan could complicate both countries' relationships with the Arab world.

"Some allege that now [the north has] Zionists on their southern frontier – meaning the South Sudanese," Neuman said. "Any very overt strengthening of the relationship might be an irritant."

The relationship faces another potential pitfall: the future of the estimated 3,000 South Sudanese living in Israel who fled to Israel via Egypt during the long civil war.

Israel "takes its obligations as a signatory to the Refugee Convention very seriously, given the history of the Jewish people," said Mark Hetfield, an official at the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society. "But at the same time, they need to send a signal to people coming for economic reasons that they can't sneak into the country under the guise of being asylum seekers."

In February, Israeli Interior Minister Eli Yishai announced plans to begin deporting South Sudanese who would not accept government financial incentives to leave the country voluntarily.

Hetfield says the group would like the Israeli government to grant South Sudanese a "temporary protected status" that would prevent them from being deported to their unstable homeland.

Mulla does not think that the Israeli refugee issue will have an impact on the broader strategic alliance between South Sudan and Israel. However, he said he has raised the issue of the possible deportations with the South Sudanese ambassador in Washington and hopes that something can be done to halt the process.

Advocates for the Africans are appealing to Israel's Supreme Court in an attempt to stall or halt the deportations.

Time magazine crowns Netanyahu as 'king of Israel'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Time magazine crowned Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu as the "king of Israel," in its cover story last week.

The story profiles Netanyahu and marks his recent feat: brokering a 94-member coalition with the rival Kadima party.

In the article, managing editor Rick Stengel outlines Netanyahu's recent achievements and explains why he is worthy of the title "king of Israel."

"Netanyahu is poised to become the longest-serving Israeli prime minister since David Ben-Gurion, the founding father of Israel. He has no national rival," Stengel writes. "His approval rating, roughly 50 per cent, is at an all-time high. At a moment when incumbents around the world are being shunted aside, he is triumphant. With his bullet-proof majority, he has a chance to turn himself into the historic figure he has always yearned to be. He has become, as some commentators have dubbed him, the king of Israel."

Stengel interviewed Netanyahu at his official residence in Jerusalem, and noted that Netanyahu "would like to be a hero, but he will not be one at the expense of Israel's security.

"He wants to be a defining figure in Israeli history and a significant player on the world stage, but he will not risk what he sees as Israel's safety to be one," Stengel writes. "His ambition and now his security as prime minister, though, may let him take that risk. Of the Palestinians, he says, 'If they figure it out, they will never have a better partner than me. I can make it happen and make it stick.'"

Stengel also inquired about Netanyahu's much-discussed relationship with Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney, to which the prime minister replied that he has only seen Romney a handful of times over the years and only once this year, when they spoke for 10 minutes, mainly about Iran.

Appelfeld Wins Award

Israeli author Aharon Appelfeld, 80, became the oldest person to win the coveted Independent Foreign Fiction Prize. The British award was announced May 14. His Blooms of Darkness tells the story of an 11-year-old boy and his relationship with a prostitute who agreed to hide him from the Nazis in a brothel. Appelfeld and the book's translator, Jeffrey Green, will each receive $8,100. The author of more than 40 works, Appelfeld, a Holocaust survivor, said the book is "a work of fiction that includes my personal experience during World War II."

New PA Cabinet

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas swore in a new cabinet in a move that could spell the end of a Fatah-Hamas unity government. It's the second reshuffle since the government was formed in 2007 under the leadership of PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad. In the new cabinet, Fayyad gave up his finance minister portfolio to another political independent, former university president Nabil Qassis. The new 21-minister cabinet includes nine new members and a record six women. The Hamas government in Gaza reportedly decried the move, calling it illegitimate and in conflict with the March agreement to establish an Abbas-led unity government.

Structures razed

Israeli security forces razed several structures at two illegal West Bank outposts. Israel Defence Forces troops, Border Guard forces and police razed a building late in the evening of May 16 at the Ramat Migron outpost, and then razed other structures at the nearby Oz Zion outpost. The Ramat Migron outpost, located next to the Migron outpost, has been demolished and rebuilt several times. Migron has been ordered razed and its residents moved by Aug. 1. Five women were arrested in the operation.

Technion helps to develop high tech in NY

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

From its very earliest days, Israel's Technion has been associated with some of the world's foremost scientists.

A few years after the cornerstone of the university was laid down 100 years ago, the school received a visit from Albert Einstein, perhaps the most renowned scientist of all time.

Einstein planted a palm tree in front of the Technion building in the Hadar neighbourhood of Haifa. The tree still stands as "a shrine that we protect," said Boaz Golany, Technion's vice-president for external relations and resource development.

Haifa school turns 100

The school would eventually outgrow its facilities in midtown Haifa and move to a 300-acre site on the Carmel, but it always strived to play with the big boys. From Einstein's involvement with the school – he would serve as president of the Technion Society in Berlin in the 1920s – to its three recent Nobel Prize winners, the Technion has been a world leader in many scientific areas, Golany said.

Golany was in Toronto and Montreal recently to update the university's supporters about developments affecting the school.

The Technion is particularly proud of winning – along with its partner, Cornell University – a competition to establish an applied science graduate school and research campus at Cornell's New York City Tech Campus on Roosevelt Island.

Only 10 overseas universities were invited to tender bids, an elite grouping that indicates how highly the Technion is perceived abroad, Golany said.

The partnership will see the Technion help design the curricula and programs at the Technion-Cornell Innovation Institute (TCII). "We bring to this marriage some elements of Technion's record of successes," Golany said. "We have an excellent record of working in R&D [with] large corporations working in Israel."

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg sees the Tech Campus as potentially vaulting New York City into the same level of scientific innovation and commercialization as enjoyed by Boston and Silicon Valley, Golany said.

TCII will be organized into multidisciplinary hubs on the Israeli model.

"Part of what we bring to the table is the international flavour," Golany said. "Without us, Cornell would have had a hard time competing with the likes of Stanford and Columbia universities. We brought them the edge."

There's also an element of payback in the Technion's involvement in New York City, Golany suggested.

One hundred years ago, when Technion was just getting on its feet, it received substantial support from a Russian tea merchant. But the money ran out in the middle of construction and so the school turned to an American benefactor, financier Jacob Schiff of New York. He provided the supplementary funding that allowed for completion of Technion's building. "Here we are closing the loop and giving back something to the city that gave us the critical support to get off the ground," Golany said.

Winning the competition certainly doesn't hurt Israel's image either, he continued. "It's very flattering and rewarding for us in Israel that we could be called by the mayor of New York to help [the city] climb the ladder and be an important centre for tech companies."

There were a handful of naysayers who challenged the involvement of an Israeli school. A number of pro-Palestinian groups at Cornell accused the school of doing business with an "apartheid university," he said.

The allegations are divorced from reality, and Cornell's administration dismissed the charges, Golany said. There are 1,500 Arab students at the Technion out of a student population of 13,000, pretty much matching the proportion of Arabs in the general population. The school also has several Arab faculty members, including Hossam Haick, who developed a groundbreaking nano technology that detects cancer, and it offers a scholarship fund for Arab students "funded by Jewish money."

Funding, of course, is a key component in any institution of higher learning, and the Technion relies on support groups abroad, particularly Canada and the United states, to help it afford the facilities that make it world class.

Despite the economic dislocations of recent years, support from Canada is on the rise, Golany said. "We have people who want to believe in us and believe in our achievements," he said.

Hershell Recht, national development director of the Canadian Technion Society, said the group is looking to add support groups in Calgary and Vancouver in coming years. "We are going to plant our flag right in the middle of the [Calgary] Saddledome," he said.

Supporters, many of them non-Jews, are attracted by the school's many innovations and the benefits that accrue to people around the world, Golany said.

"You get a bigger bang for the buck" at the Technion, Golany said. "Plus, you're investing in the future of the Jewish people. A strong Israel means pride and a sense of belonging and a purpose to Jewish communities."

Facebook IPO: Is it good for the Jews?

Uriel Heilman
JTA

NEW YORK — If the Talmud were written today, would it look like Facebook?

First, the rabbis of the mishnaic period post a Jewish legal rule. Then, talmudic sages weigh in with their comments, all pithy and lacking punctuation. Almost immediately, the comments grow far longer than the original post. Eventually, outside links to the Shulchan Aruch and Maimonides' compendium of Jewish law appear on the right side.

It may sound too cute by half, but if you look closely, the Talmud and Facebook actually share similar layout.

They also share a few basic ideas about commentary and community. The Talmud enabled scholars who lived in different times and different places to argue with each other, creating a virtual community. Facebook allows people who live in different places and may not know each other to do the same.

"Every piece of information that's offered opens up the opportunity for commentary, for amplification – whether it's a link from the New York Times or something that happened to you at the Israeli Interior Ministry or an idea that you simply want to express," said Esther Kustanowitz, a Jewish social media expert who works part time for the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles. "And Facebook doesn't just amplify the message, it expands the conversation."

On the eve of Facebook's initial public offering, scheduled for May 18, Jews – like everyone else – were still figuring out how Facebook can serve their personal or professional needs.

What started out in a college dorm in 2003 as a way for Harvard University students to rate women's comparative "hotness" (it was then called Facemash.com) has morphed into a medium for more than 900 million people worldwide to communicate with each other, rally support or opposition, publicize news, make money, flirt and fulminate in ways both profound and mundane about the million and one things happening at any given moment.

For a few in the Jewish community, Facebook's IPO raises the $64,000 question – or in this case, the $64 billion (all figures US) question – of how much of that newly created wealth will go to Jewish causes. The jury's still out on whether Facebook's Jewish creator, Mark Zuckerberg, will turn into a major Jewish giver following the IPO, when the just-turned 28-year-old figures to become one of the richest people in the world.

But the real story of Facebook's impact on the Jewish world ultimately is likely to be more about the ways it is prompting Jews to change the way they think, behave, organize, and even mourn and celebrate than it will be about Zuckerberg's tzedakah.

Facebook helped thousands of Israelis co-ordinate last summer's socioeconomic protests, the biggest in Israel's history. The site helped J Street turn from a fledgling, little-known upstart into a broad-based, left-wing alternative to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Most Jewish community institutions, however, haven't yet figured out how to maximize the potential of Facebook, according to Lisa Colton, president of Darim Online, a Virginia-based company that helps Jewish organizations adapt to the digital age.

Partly, Colton says, that's because Facebook is inherently threatening to institutions.

"Facebook is about people more than it is about institutions. It supports individuals connecting with and learning from each other," she said. "It's a wonderful way for individuals to circumvent institutions."

Facebook enables Jews to construct communities organized around areas of interest rather than geography, religious denomination or institution.

When Montreal native Hindy Poupko Galena and her husband, Seth, began using Facebook to update friends and family about their year-old daughter's fight against a rare bone marrow disease, a community of sympathizers quickly emerged that included thousands of people who had never met the toddler, Ayelet.

Strangers reached out to the Galenas – members of the modern Orthodox community on Manhattan's Upper West Side – not just with messages, but with care packages.

"It allowed people to connect with what was going on a very deep and real level," Hindy said. "So many people came out of the woodwork and e-mailed me and said, 'I had a sick kid and never told anyone about it, but I now feel that I can tell people about it.' "

Even now, months after Ayelet's death in January at age two, the Facebook-based community, which they call Ayelet Nation, serves as a source of sympathy for the Galenas.

"For a girl who only lived two years, it's very comforting to know that people know her name, and I think that was only possible because of Facebook," Hindy said.

Whereas many Jewish institutions such as synagogues, JCCs and the Israeli rabbinate, to name just a few, define their community by who's inside and who's out, Facebook offers an opportunity for a Jewish community with no bounds.

"It can take Jewish leaders off their pedestals and get them to interact with real people and real life in a multidimensional way," said William Daroff, the director of the Washington office of the Jewish Federations of North America, who has more than 3,000 "friends" on the social networking website.

"And it's not just about the Jewish world, but a place for us to talk about our kids and our dogs and the games we like to play and who we really are."

As Facebook evolves, the Jewish communities it enables will change, too.

"I think it really is analogous to having phone lines, which later enabled faxes and early Internet," Colton said. "With Facebook, it's not about what we see and use today, it's about what its foundations and widespread adoption make possible in the future."

Jewish Book Awards will honour 9 authors

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

S. Weilbach, an 80-year-old Holocaust survivor in Vancouver, has won the 2012 Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Award in the Poetry category for a long poem she had put off writing for decades because the memories were too painful.

The author's first book, Singing from the Darktime: A Childhood Memoir in Poetry and Prose (McGill-Queens University Press) recaptures the immediacy of Weilbach's feelings as she travels with her parents and grandfather aboard the ill-fated refugee ship, the St. Louis, along with more than 900 refugees hoping to escape the Nazis' clutches in 1939. Blocked from landing in Cuba, America or Canada, the St. Louis was ultimately forced to return to Europe.

In an online interview, Weilbach explained that the childhood feelings and memories she revisited in writing her story were far too delicate to be expressed in prose: only poetry would suffice. However, she uses prose in a latter section in which she and her family disembark from the St. Louis to begin new lives in wartime Britain.

Weilbach's sense "of profound grief and the helplessness of trying to save anyone," as she described it online, comes across in her writing. One stanza in particular, occurring just as the passengers learn they will not be landing in Havana, seems to convey some of the surreal imagery of the iconic Edvard Munch painting The Scream:

The empty deckchairs line along the painted wall, / And I sit down and watch the seabirds swoop. / But all at once I hear some footsteps race /Across the boards above my head / And someone yelling, "no-o-o-o!" When I stand up to look / A sudden bright red streak / Is trickling down the glassy wall. / From every side the people run. / A woman in a purple dressing-gown / Bursts through the bulkhead door / Near where I stand. / She screams and screams.

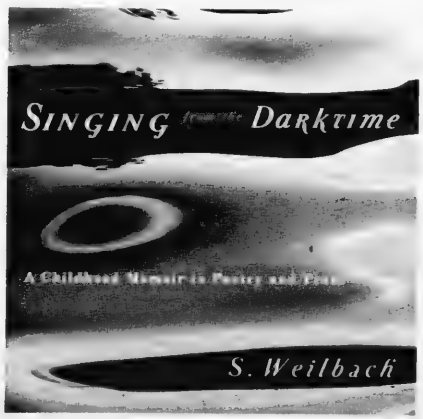
Weilbach's childhood memories of her family's dairy farm in Germany, the long and increasingly desperate sea voyage, and subsequent return to normalcy are conveyed with vividness and profound directness. She is a deft painter of human nature, interpersonal relations and even God's role in human affairs as her child's mind tries to puzzle out what she sees happening in front of her.



"We were delighted to discover this little book, which had not had much publicity," Judy Stoffman, chair of the nine-person Canadian Jewish Book Awards jury, told The CJN.

Nine prizes will be given out at the 24th annual Canadian Jewish Book Awards ceremony on June 7.

Winner of the prize in fiction is David Bezmozgis for his first novel, The Free World (HarperCollins). As previously reviewed in this space, the book follows members of the Latvian Krasnansky family who attempt to immigrate to "the free world" in 1978, but get stalled in a bureaucratic purgatory in Rome. Dark and deliciously ironic, The Free World must have eclipsed any other fiction entry of 2011 and would have been all but impossible for the jury to overlook.

I found A Fiery Soul: The Life and Theatrical Times of John Hirsch, by Fraidie Martz and Andrew Wilson (Vehicule Press), particularly engaging. Solidly researched and filled with anecdotes, it is – like a good souffle – "fluffy, not stuffy" as it recounts the key episodes of Hirsch's remarkable career and private life. No wonder it won the prize for best biography.

Perhaps Canada's most gifted theatrical director, Hirsch was a Holocaust orphan who arrived in Winnipeg in 1947, and directed theatrical triumphs (and many failures) in Manitoba, Stratford, Toronto, New York and Los Angeles. High points included a brilliant production of S. Ansky's The Dybbuk and, when Hirsch was head of CBC drama, the famed King of Kensington TV series. This highly readable bio celebrates Hirsch's accomplishments but is not hagiographic, clearly revealing that its subject could be "a monster" as well.

This year the jury made a rare decision to award a prize (History) to a book written in French and as yet unavailable in English. Perusing Denis Vaugeois's Les Premiers Juifs d'Amerique, 1760-1860: L'extraordinaire histoire de la famille Hart, it's clear to see why. Published by Septentrion, this beautifully illustrated history of Quebec's historic Hart family likely trumps all previous works on the subject. Let's hope the English edition is not too long in coming.

Richard Marceau's Juif, Une Histoire Quebecoise, was also published originally in French (by Editions du Marais) but has appeared in English as A Quebec Jew. It won the memoir prize. The author, a lawyer and former Bloc Quebecois MP, converted to Judaism after meeting his future wife. As his book recounts, his Jewish faith and love of Israel have become as much a part of his identity as his French Quebec roots.

Rebecca Margolis took the Yiddish prize for Jewish Roots, Canadian Soil (McGill-Queen's University Press), an academic study of Montreal's vibrant Yiddish cultural scene from the 1930s onward, and how it helped to sustain Jewish culture in the Diaspora.

Also written in academic prose, Kalman Weiser's Jewish People, Yiddish Nation: Noah Prylucki and the Folklorists in Poland (University of Toronto Press) took the scholarship prize. Prylucki was a leading Jewish cultural and political figure in pre-Holocaust Eastern Europe, whose path from Zionism to secular Yiddish culturalism illuminates the dilemmas and competing options facing the Jews of his era.

The other winning titles are The Muselmann at the Water Cooler (Academic Studies Press) by Eli Pfefferkorn, which took the Holocaust literature prize; and Yuvi's Candy Tree (Kar-Ben Publishing), by Lesley Simpson, which won the prize in youth literature.

The 2012 Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards take place at the culmination of the Toronto Jewish Book Festival, at the Toronto Reference Library, Bram and Bluma Appel Salon, Thursday June 7, 8 p.m. Admission is free and everyone is invited.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Toronto actor stars in Rent

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Aaron Sax made his theatre debut at the age of six, delivering exactly one line as Tweety Bird in a summer camp production of The Looney Tunes.

He was either a very convincing bird, or a very cute kid, because as he grew with the years, so did his parts in camp and children's theatre troupe plays.

Now 23, Sax is gearing up for his most exciting lead role yet. He will be starring as Mark Cohen in the modern musical Rent at the Lower Ossington Theatre. Sax has already performed in major and supporting roles at the theatre in musicals, including Spring Awakening and Forever Plaid, but he is extra enthusiastic about his upcoming part, which he starts tonight.

"Mark is one of my dream roles," said Sax of the show's narrator, a young struggling documentary filmmaker. He added that he naturally gravitates toward roles that interact with the audience, or, in theatre-speak, "break the fourth wall."

Mark Cohen leads the audience through the bohemian life of artists in New York, following a storyline that is based on Giacomo Puccini's famous opera La Bohème.

"In a role like that, the audience has to like you or else the show's in trouble," said Sax of the challenges that come along with playing a lead character who interacts both with the audience and with the other characters. "I'm learning what it's like to carry a show," he added.

As a graduate of Sheridan College's renowned music theatre program, Sax has spent plenty of time preparing for exciting roles like this one. "It's one of the toughest things I've ever had to do," he said of the rigorous program, explaining that when he applied to it in his last year of high school, he had not expected to get in. To his surprise, he was given an immediate and very rare recommendation for direct acceptance at his audition.

Despite the difficulty of the music theatre program, which, with classes and rehearsals, often had Sax at school for 13-hour days, he credits it with giving him the training he needed to become a professional actor.

Sax also said that it was at Sheridan, where he was the only Jewish student in his year, that he became more aware and appreciative of his culture. Now, he said, he frequently chooses Jewish characters for audition material, as he often feels more connected to them. One of his favourite characters is Fiddler on the Roof's Tevye.

Sax's love of performance has led him not only into traditional musical theatre but also into children's theatre. "Children's theatre is pretty awesome because your audience is engaged all the time," he said.

He has been working with well-known children's entertainers Judy and David since October on their GoldiRocks and Jigjilump shows. Sax has also performed in the children's productions Angelina Ballerina and Pinkalicious with the Vital Theatre Company.

It comes as no surprise that Sax has both an affinity and talent for children's theatre. This summer will be his second summer running the theatre program for campers at Camp Wahanowin, where he first debuted on stage as Tweety almost 20 years ago.

Whether Sax is performing for children or adults, he feels passionately about theatre, and tends to prefer musical theatre to drama. "I enjoy singing and I enjoy acting through the songs," he said.

Sax said he is looking forward to all the varied theatre opportunities that are coming his way, and he is eager to try new and different roles. For him, each experience in theatre is worthwhile. "Everything you do, you meet different people and make different connections and further yourself in a different way."

Dancer 'stole' hearts on Canada's Got Talent

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Although he didn't win, Shale Wagman gained a lot from his experience on Canada's Got Talent.

"I got a lot of exposure and had so much fun, even though I didn't win," the 12-year-old ballet dancer from Vaughan, Ont., said. "I met so many great people, and I am excited for what's going to happen next."

Scott Moore, president of broadcasting for Rogers Media, said he was surprised Wagman didn't win.

"Shale was one of my top two personal choices. I thought he was going to win. Shale is a natural, refined already at such a young age. He stole everybody's heart," Moore said.

Shale Wagman

"I first saw Shale at the Toronto auditions and I was captivated by him. Here is a young man, unlike a lot of his friends, taking the road less travelled – getting up on stage and showcasing his talent with such pride," Moore said.

Sagkeeng's Finest, a trio of First Nation dancers from Manitoba, were the winners at the show's finale, which aired May 14.

The underdogs rose to the occasion. Their hearts came across to Canada, and they were voted most-improved act throughout the competition.

"They never thought they would make it through the auditions, let alone take the whole thing," said the host of the show, Dina Pugliese.

She added, "It's the X factor. All 12 acts were phenomenal. It was a matter of who resonated to Canadians that would motivate them to vote and what was that extra something about their story or performance that night that would make somebody pick up the phone or log on to the website and vote."

Wagman, meanwhile, will continue competing. His summer plans include a national dance competition in Florida.

"I'm going to sleepover camp, and of course I will be dancing all the time," he said.

"We are going to see a lot more of Shale Wagman," Stephan Moccio a judge of Canada's Got Talent, said.

'Israeli idol' rocks for a good cause

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The star of a popular American Idol-type show in Israel, rocked the crowd at a sold-out show last week in honour of an Israeli organization that works to treat former IDF soldiers suffering from Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD).

Idan Amedi sang at a benefit concert for Peace of Mind (POM), a program funded by The Israel Center for the Treatment of Psychotrauma (ICTP), that benefits discharged Israeli soldiers by bringing them to Toronto for a therapeutic, week-long retreat. The concert was held May 14 at Thornhill's Sephardic Kehilla Centre.

Linoy Hazan, POM's Canadian co-ordinating director, explained that since 1989, ICTP has been working to treat the estimated nine per cent of Israelis who suffer from PTSD – which is three times the level of that in the most western countries.

"Different groups of discharged vets are brought here several times a year. They are housed by members of our community and attend community events while they're here" and take part in daily therapy sessions, Hazan told the gathering.

She said the program helps veterans find their way back to civilian life by providing them "with an opportunity to strengthen their mental health and resilience."

Last week, Toronto hosted a unit from the IDF's Nahal Brigade, a combat unit.

Before Amedi, 24, who finished second in the eighth season Kochav Nolad (A Star is Born), took to the stage, Israeli Consul General for Toronto and Western Canada Amir Gissin briefly welcomed "his brothers from the Nahal unit.

"It's been 25 years since I ran with the Nahal uniform and cap," Gissin began.

"Some of us went through experiences more than others and it is very difficult to begin to understand these experiences that stay with you and don't go away... And this is why it is important that we have a project that gives them a true chance for a new beginning."

Few can relate to the troops as well as Amedi, who was still in uniform when he auditioned for Kochav Nolad in 2010 with a song he wrote called Pain of The Warrior, which is about his experiences as a combat soldier.

Little did he know that two years later, that song would be used in therapy sessions by an ICTP therapist.

Hazan explained how Amedi came to volunteer his time and talent to help raise awareness about the organization.

"He was doing a performance in Israel, and one of our therapists had heard his song, Pain of the Warrior, that talks about nightmares and blood on the uniform. He started to use his song in therapy sessions," Hazan said.

"After seeing him perform, the therapist approached him and explained to him how much his song has helped other soldiers involved with the organization."

She said when Amedi learned more about POM, he was eager to help in any way he could, and insisted on performing the benefit concert free of charge.

"That's the kind of person he is. He's so grounded," Hazan said.

Throughout the hour-long performance that had some audience members singing along to the tracks off his 2011 debut album, he spoke to the crowd in both Hebrew and English, sharing an anecdote about fans encountering him on the street (a fan told him, "You wish you were Idan Amedi. He's way better looking"), as well as the meaning and inspiration behind some of his songs.

One of the songs he performed at the concert was written while he worked on Soon We'll Become a Song, a project in which musicians composed songs using the poetry of fallen soldiers.

When he received a stack of letters written to the girlfriend of a soldier who died in the Second Lebanon War, Amedi used direct quotes from the letters to write a song about the soldier's pain and longing for his girlfriend and family.

Following the performance, which ended with the visiting IDF veterans dancing around him and serenading him with a song the unit used to sing during training camp, Amedi was showered with thank-you gifts donated by a number of host families from the Jewish community, including an iPad and a Toronto Maple Leafs hockey jersey with his name stitched on the back.

The concert raised $40,000 for the cause. "Every single dollar raised today will go towards sustaining and improving this very worthy endeavor," Hazan said.

IOC rejects moment of silence for Munich 11

JTA

JERUSALEM — The International Olympic Committee (IOC) has officially rejected a request to hold a moment of silence for the Munich 11 at the London Olympics this summer.

"The IOC has officially paid tribute to the memory of the athletes on several occasions," IOC president Jacques Rogge wrote in a letter dated May 15. "Within the Olympic family, the memory of the victims of the terrible massacre in Munich in 1972 will never fade away."

Families of the athletes initiated the request for the moment of silence at the opening ceremonies. Palestinian Black September terrorists killed 11 Israeli athletes and coaches at the 1972 Games in Germany.

Rogge's letter came in response to an official request filed last month by Danny Ayalon, Israel's deputy foreign minister.

"Unfortunately, this response is unacceptable as it rejects the central principles of global fraternity on which the Olympic ideal is supposed to rest," Ayalon said last week in a statement. "The terrorist murders of the Israeli athletes were not just an attack on people because of their nationality and religion. [They were] an attack on the Olympic Games and the international community. Thus, it is necessary for the Olympic Games as a whole to commemorate this event in the open, rather than only in a side event."

The Israel National Olympic Committee will hold its own memorial ceremony during the Games, as it has at every Olympics. Rogge pledged that IOC representatives would attend the ceremony.

Israel has regularly requested a moment of silence at the Olympics; the IOC has consistently turned down that proposal.

Also last week, the American Jewish Committee called on the IOC to reconsider its rejection.

"The 40th anniversary of that tragedy is a perfect opportunity for the Olympics to properly honour the memory of those innocent Israelis," AJC executive director David Harris said. "The IOC refusal to hold a moment of silence during the London Games' opening ceremony, which will be watched worldwide, is simply shameful."

The 1972 Israeli Olympic team

U.S. Reps. Nita Lowey and Eliot Engel, both New York Democrats, and the Anti-Defamation League in recent weeks also had called on the IOC in letters to approve the moment of silence.

The Jewish Community Center of Rockland County, N.Y., a member of the JCC Association, and Ankie Spitzer, the widow of Israeli fencing Coach Andrei Spitzer, initiated an online petition in mid-April seeking a moment of silence at the London Games. It has garnered some 38,000 signatures from around the world.

"The 11 murdered athletes were members of the Olympic family; we feel they should be remembered within the framework of the Olympic Games," Spitzer wrote in a letter accompanying the petition.

Olympic torch sets down in Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The torch that will be used to light the Olympic flame at the opening ceremony on July 27 landed in Israel earlier this month for a two-day visit. The torch was displayed at an Olympic sports event in Haifa.

"This is a great honour for us," said Olympic Committee of Israel (OCI) president Zvi Varshaviak, as he posed with the unlit torch. "I hope that just as the torch reached us, our athletes will return from London with medals."

"This is the first time the torch has reached Israel on its way to the Olympic Games," said OCI director general Efraim Zinger. "This is a piece of history. The Olympic Games is a great social event, and I hope that after they see the torch in Haifa..., many more children will share the Olympic experience."

Browns sign lineman

JTA

CLEVELAND — Offensive lineman Mitchell Schwartz, a second-round draft pick of the Cleveland Browns, signed a four-year, $5.17-million (US) contract with the team.

Schwartz, a tackle from the University of California, Berkeley, was selected 37th overall in April's draft. The Jewish player was among eight draft picks signed by the team last week. Browns head coach Pat Shurmur said Schwartz displayed solid technique that could quickly catapult him into a full-time player, according to the Cleveland Jewish News.

"He is very sound in his fundamentals," Shurmur said. "He's very detailed with his sets, he is good with his hands, he understands what the defence is going to do by the way they are aligned. He's a very sharp guy."

Schwartz, whose older brother Geoff is in his fourth season in the NFL, said he had a "pretty decent understanding of what to expect" coming into camp, and wanted to focus on improving daily.

"Obviously whatever your weakness is, you kind of want to make that into your strength," he said. "At the same time, you don't want to let your strengths become your weaknesses. It's always a nice little balance. So far, we've been doing a little bit of everything. Working different techniques in the run game, different techniques in the pass game with our hands, our feet."

Schwartz also responded to draft pundits' assertions that he was "NFL ready," crediting his coaches at the University of California for giving him a strong foundation.

Filmmaker's work shows human capacity for change

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Michael Oved Dayan recalls growing up with a camera in his hands. He was the family filmmaker, responsible for documenting his family's events. Even though his passion for film quickly grew, he didn't think he would make a career out of it.

His plans changed when he was finishing his master's dissertation in communications at McGill University and decided to make a short biographical film called Glimpses of Heaven, about three West Coast Canadian artists who use their art to cope with childhood traumas.

The film earned him an honourable mention in the Rhode Island International Film Festival in 2008, and he was named best director in the Las Vegas International Film Festival in 2007.

"It fared much better than what I had imagined. It received a lot of great feedback from people who have felt inspired by it and that made me feel really good, knowing that I could participate in a meaningful conversation in life," said Dayan.

Dayan, who grew up in Vancouver, completed his undergraduate degree at the University of Toronto in conflict resolution, game theory and international relations. During this program, he spent a year abroad at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. In Israel, he also interned in the department of human rights at the Justice Ministry.

After finishing his master's degree in religion, politics, peace and reconciliation at Columbia University in New York, he returned to Canada to obtain his PhD in communications from McGill University.

It was while studying communications that he became interested in the way the media could be a therapeutic tool.

"Through filmmaking, I learned that helping people construct their life narrative really provides them with a therapeutic perspective on life," he said.

When a friend told him about a medical clinic he had visited in Tibet, Dayan immediately knew he wanted to turn it into his next film.

"I have this mandate that I want to make biographical films and I want them to have a redemptive quality – to make films that show personal growth and human capacity for change, and I saw that in this town of Tibet," he said.

Michael Dayan followed Dr. Isaac Sobol to the remote village in Eastern Tibet called Yushu, where he established a primary care medical health clinic.

Citizens of Yushu waited to be seen by Dr. Sobol at the clinic.

Michael Oved Dayan

The film, called High Plains Doctor: Healing on the Tibetan Plateau, follows Dr. Isaac Sobol, a Jewish doctor and chief medical officer of health in Nunavut, on his 10th trip to Yushu, a remote village in the Kham region of eastern Tibet, where he establishes a primary-care medical health clinic. The film was shot in 2007 in two locations: Iqaluit, Nunavut, and Yushu, Tibet.

"Isaac shares his reflections on what he's seen treating aboriginal people in Canada and the similarities the people in Tibet are experiencing ... like challenges in keeping pace with modernity. [For both of the communities], there have been so many changes in the way things are done that traditional ways are not sustainable."

There is one "western" doctor for about every 17,000 people in Tibet, so Sobol and his team worked with very limited resources and attempted to treat the hundreds of patients who lined up every day at the clinic.

"People would spend a week walking to the clinic and then wait in line for hours to see Sobol. The problem with Tibetan medicine is that the changing climate affected their traditional herbs and medicinal plants, and during China's Cultural Revolution [which purged Chinese society of many of its traditional and cultural elements], a lot of books were destroyed so the ancient medical knowledge has been lost," said Dayan.

"They don't have money to access doctors so you see conditions that would have been treated much earlier in Canada."

Sobol did not know that this trip would be his last. On April 14, 2010, a 7.1 magnitude earthquake hit the town of Yushu, killing more than 2,000 people, injuring about 10,000 and destroying the small town.

Dayan believes his film is now the only existing footage of this village.

"About 80 per cent of the village was destroyed after the earthquake, and I haven't been able to find anyone else with footage of this town," said Dayan.

Dayan said he hoped to portray the exchange between Sobol and the inhabitants of the town.

"Sobol goes to Tibet to help them, but in the end he also receives a gift from them. They give him a sense of purpose. As a Jew, he feels like he can relate to the Tibetans because his family survived the Holocaust. There was this idea they weren't meant to exist because of their religion, so he understands the Tibetans' feelings of marginalization," said Dayan.

The film premièred on CBC earlier this month. Dayan has already started working on his next film, called Abraham's German Children, which looks at relatives of Nazis who have converted to Judaism.

Sustainable institutions

Have you heard the term "low-hanging fruit"? Generally, it's used to describe something that is easy to reach and enjoy.

Imagine you are sitting on a synagogue or school board, and the building/house committee brought the following proposal forward: "If you follow our recommendation to change a set of bulbs, we can cut our operating costs for the affected part of the building by 78 per cent." How do you probe that number? What is the impact on overall costs? Is 78 per cent a real number?

Last month, I posed a question as to whether you know what is driving your organization's operational costs when it comes to energy. This month, we will begin to work through an exercise to determine how you can make a quantitative and informed decision about changing equipment to reduce the amount of energy consumed.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

For many years, lighting has been considered the low-hanging fruit of electricity consumption. At a synagogue or school, the number of unique light-bulb types is generally larger than at home. In addition to incandescent bulbs, the building will likely have a mix of fluorescent, halogen, older generation compact fluorescent bulbs (CFLs) and other types of bulbs.

Few organizations in our community have an inventory of their electrical lights organized in some easy to analyze format, for example, by room or within a heating/ cooling zone. Even fewer know the schedule of occupancy of those rooms or zones. Why is this important? Simple math!

Assuming a room has 100 90-watt halogen floodlights, it consumes nine kilowatt hours for every hour the lights are on. If the consumption charge is 10 cents per kilowatt hour, you are paying 90 cents for every hour the lights are on. If your lights in the room are on for six hours each day, the room costs you $5.40 a day to operate and $1,971 for the year.

What if you now replaced the 90-watt bulb with a 20-watt bulb? Under the same assumptions, two kilowatt hours times $.10 cents per kilowatt hour times six hours costs $1.20 to operate per day and $438 per year. This reduces operating costs by 78 per cent.

If you were a member of the board, or a fee-paying member of the synagogue, or a tuition-paying parent of a Jewish day school, and keep seeing fee increases attributed to increased operating costs, what additional questions would you be asking to ensure that the 78 per cent saving is real?

This example and others will be discussed at an upcoming meeting to be called by David Sadowski, executive vice-president of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, responsible for Jewish community properties. The meeting will bring schools and synagogues together to review best practices in energy management and conservation, share success stories, and establish a base of information on energy consumption that would help community organizations get a handle on operational expense.

The feds' fear of the stranger

What's happening to the Canadian soul? Where has our federal government stashed it?

Bill C-10, an omnibus crime bill recently passed, was overwhelmingly criticized by professionals of all backgrounds, religious leaders and vast numbers of "average Joes."

Here is an example of one of the laws found in Bill C-10. If your daughter has six marijuana plants, she can go to jail for six months. A drug dealer with 200 plants can also be sentenced to six months. A judge can no longer look at extenuating circumstances such as prior convictions.

Studies have shown mandatory minimum sentences don't work (see the New York Times editorial at http://nyti.ms/J6sPo0). Texas, a state not known for its compassion, told our federal government that our laws, including minimum sentencing, are too harsh. Texas would know. Our ideologically driven government refuses to listen. Why?

Bill C-31, an omnibus bill on Canada's refugee system, exists to crack down on bogus refugee claimants. The bill says "regular arrivals" or "smuggled migrants in large numbers" can be detained for 14 days and then a review takes place. If the individuals are kept incarcerated, then there is a six-month review. This wording was only amended after a public backlash. Initially Bill C-31 stated refugees could be detained for one year without review. What?

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

New Democratic Party immigration critic Jinny Sims said this about Bill C-31: "What we have heard overwhelmingly from witnesses is that the bill will do nothing to prevent human smuggling, while punishing refugees."

In a recent Toronto Star article by Harold Troper, Dr. Joseph Wong and Joy Kogawa, they stated, "Not only does this bill run contrary to the tradition of humanitarianism so many Canadians are proud of, it returns Canada to the days when racism and xenophobia were part of our official immigration policy."

There's more federal disappointment.

As of June 30, refugees with chronic diseases such as hypertension, angina and diabetes will be denied medical care. Dr. Mark Tyndall, head of Infectious Diseases at the Ottawa Hospital said: "This new refugee health-care policy violates my ethical obligations as a physician. It is unethical and a disgrace to Canadian society."

Tyndall continued: "I have never met a refugee who came to Canada because they wanted better health care."

Michael McBane, the executive director of the Canadian Health Coalition, said about this law: "The dismantling of one of the oldest parts of Canada's public health-care system – health care for displaced persons who arrived in Canada following World War II – is symptomatic of the Harper government's approach to health care. 'Cut and run' is their motto, and changing the hearts of Canadians from compassion to contempt is their goal."

There's more.

Immigration Canada is going to designate certain countries as "safe." If you come from a "safe" country, you cannot claim refugee status. Hungary, home to many Roma, will no doubt be a safe place, yet according to Amnesty International, the Roma are mistreated by Hungarian nationals. Nevertheless, the Roma will be refused entry into Canada.

There is a Jewish value that stands taller than most others. It says, we must take care of the stranger. The Jews on the SS St. Louis knew that this wasn't a Canadian value during the World War II. Their boat was turned back to Europe, sending most to their deaths. In the 1970s, the "boat people" from Vietnam were taken in by prime minister Joe Clark's Canada and "the stranger" was once again embraced by our country.

Our government is reversing so much of the love we have learned. Where have they stashed our soul?

Many Faces... One Community

A salute to our community and its volunteers

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Volunteers are the engine that drives UJA Federation

As the Chairs of United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2013, we are thrilled that through the following pages, UJA has the opportunity to acknowledge and thank the remarkable men, women and children who volunteer their energy, time and talents to make Jewish Toronto one of the strongest communities in the Diaspora.

Their contributions come in many different forms including creating events, canvassing donors, and spreading the word about the unique, vital and strategic work that UJA donations enable. After all, UJA Federation is our sole Jewish communal fund, serving a vast range of social, educational and advocacy needs in Toronto, Israel and across the globe.

As with any successful organization, we are powered by our incredible cadre of volunteers, who, together, comprise the engine that drives UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

In addition to encouraging others to donate generously to UJA's annual campaign, we encourage you to find a volunteer role that you would find interesting and challenging. We can assure you, you will be amazed at how rewarding it will be.

We look forward to Campaign 2013, and to meeting and working with all of the volunteers, each of whom will play an important role in the success of that campaign.

Appreciatively,

As Jewish Toronto continues to grow and flourish, so too does UJA Federation's responsibility to ensure that our community maintains its place as one of the most successful in the Diaspora.

Of course, without Jewish Toronto's talented, visionary and tireless core of volunteers, that task would be considerably more difficult.

These unique individuals give so much of themselves for the betterment of our community, while ensuring a strong and vibrant future for all of us.

Whether it's making the Walk with Israel the annual success that it is, or helping out at community rallies or celebrations, these men, women and children help bring many dreams to fruition.

This annual Volunteer Recognition Supplement is UJA Federation's way of showing our sincere appreciation for all that our volunteers do for Jewish Toronto, and to thank them for their unrelenting commitment to tzedakah and tikkun olam, repairing the world.

Thank you!

Sincerely,

Jewish Toronto is part of a "Nation of Volunteers"

Every Rosh Hashanah, we recite Psalm 47 as a precursor to our blowing the Shofar. In that psalm, the Jewish people are referred to as "the nation of Abraham's G-d." According to the Midrash, we are specifically called Abraham's nation because Abraham was the first volunteer; he freely opened his heart and home to others. Wherever he traveled, he spread a beautiful message of brotherhood and love of G-d. The Jewish people possess this quality, to freely offer their services to both G-d and to their fellow human being. It's worthwhile reminding ourselves about this quality on Rosh Hashanah, because that is a time of asking G-d to grant us the gift of a healthy new year as a just recompense for the gifts that we have freely shared with the world.

The word "mitzvah" translates as "commandment," and that seems contrary to the notion that we are a nation of volunteers. After all, how can I volunteer to do something that I'm already obligated to do? But within the varied mitzvot contained in the Torah are boundless possibilities. One can give tzedakah on a minimal level, or can voluntarily give more. One can visit the sick as often as one likes, or can volunteer for a Jewish organization that benefits the entire community. Yes, one is doing a "mitzvah," but not as an obligation, but rather with a benevolent heart.

Before the Jews had a Torah, there were no "commandments," just opportunities to do good and spread goodness throughout the world. This was Abraham's world, and it is his DNA that courses through our veins. Every impulse that drives us to volunteer our time and resources is a response to the ancient call of our father Abraham. Fortunate are those who have answered his call; Abraham is surely proudly smiling upon you.

UJA Federation funds gender-based violence training in Juba

IsraAID experts lead first ever workshop in South Sudan

By Daniel Horowitz

On Thursday March 2nd, IsraAID: The Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid dispatched a delegation of Israeli experts to Juba, South Sudan, with the support of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, IsraAID's largest financial supporter. The delegation - which includes three highly-skilled Israeli therapists with extensive experience in trauma and sexual abuse - is conducting the first ever Gender Based Violence (GBV) training program for social workers in Juba, aimed at fighting violence against women in the new nation.

On March 6th, the South Sudanese Minister of Social Development, Her Excellency Helen Murshalli, officially inaugurated the program which, during the 10-day workshop, saw IsraAID teach 29 social workers from the ministry and the local Non-Governmental Organization, Confident Children out of Conflict (CCC), the practical skills needed to guide and support survivors of GBV from Juba and the entire Central Equatorial district.

IsraAID's team of experts are in Juba, South Sudan, to train local social workers about violence against women and young girls.

In her speech, her Excellency stressed the key role that social workers play in building a stable and healthy nation. For this reason, training social workers should be a priority in the development of South Sudan. Her Excellency also praised IsraAID for organizing the first training on GBV for social workers, and highlighted the historic relationship between Israel and South Sudan, calling for a deepening and strengthening of the ties that connect these two nations, as did the Executive Director of IsraAID, Shachar Zahavi.

"IsraAID recognizes the dramatic opportunity for the organization - as well as for Israel as a whole - to contribute to nation-building and development in South Sudan through the transfer of Israeli expertise," said Zahavi. "Israel benefits from unique 'know-how' and technologies in a wide range of areas, and is therefore capable of organizing rich and impact-oriented training programs in response to the local needs, while respecting and promoting local ownership."

On March 1st, news of IsraAID'S upcoming efforts in Juba made its way to the House of Commons, where the MP for St. Paul's, Dr. Carolyn Bennett, made the following statement:

"On the eve of a visit to Canada by Israel's Prime Minister, I would like to acknowledge the important work of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in partnering with IsraAID, an Israeli humanitarian organization, to help South Sudan fight violence against women," "...The program is funded primarily by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and by extension, charitable donations from Toronto's Jewish community, and is an example of the close level of cooperation between Canadians and Israelis on important global issues. I applaud UJA and IsraAID for this important contribution to nation-building and development in South Sudan."

MP Dr. Carolyn Bennett

"UJA Federation has long been a supporter of IsraAID's remarkable search and rescue, medical, trauma and other life-saving efforts when natural disasters have struck around the world," said Ted Sokolsky, UJA Federation's President & CEO. "And now, to enable these gifted Israeli experts to help eradicate senseless, brutal violence against women and young girls in South Sudan, is extremely gratifying. We will continue to provide IsraAID with our support, and the support of Toronto's compassionate Jewish community."

Two-year-old's birthday benefits underprivileged Israeli children

By Monique Gottlieb

When Reuben Hason turned two last December, his parents, Cheri and Yuval, decided to celebrate a little differently. In lieu of gifts, Reuben's family and friends were asked to contribute to the Reuben Hason Birthday Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the endowment arm of UJA Federation. Given the festive time of year and the family's strong connection to Israel, the Hasons decided to put the funds raised toward a Chanukah party for underprivileged children at the Youth Futures program in Eilat.

Historically, Eilat-Eilot has been a single-industry region, with 80% of the population employed either directly or indirectly by the tourist industry. These jobs generally don't demand professional training or promise a stable income. Through various initiatives, UJA Federation is working to transform Eilat-Eilot into a centre of opportunity. The Youth Futures program is one such initiative which empowers disadvantaged Israeli youth, providing them with equal opportunity to develop their academic and social skills, and shaping them into successful adults.

Thanks to Reuben's gift, the children at the Youth Futures program had an unforgettable Chanukah, participating in various holiday activities like cooking latkes, making candles, and decorating dreidels. As well, each child received a Chanukah present – for many of them, their first. In a letter thanking Reuben for his gift, the children wrote, "It doesn't matter who you ask, this Chanukah was like no other! All through Chanukah's school break the Youth Futures home was lit and anywhere you looked you could see happy faces."

While Reuben is still too young to understand the impact he has made, the idea of tzedakah runs strong in his family. The amount of money raised in honour of his birthday spoke volumes. "Everyone was happy to contribute," explained Reuben's mother, Cheri. "It was really reassuring to know that our family and friends were so eager to participate in something like this. Hopefully others will be inspired to do the same."

By giving his birthday gifts to underprivileged children, Reuben has already practiced tikkun olam (repairing the world). Reuben's gift demonstrates how easy it can be to make a difference in the world. "I think people are intimidated; that it's a hard thing to do, but the staff at the Jewish Foundation made it so easy," explained Cheri.

Reuben Hason celebrating his 2nd birthday

The Jewish Foundation is involved in many charitable projects in Canada, Israel, and around the world. The Foundation specializes in matching individuals to projects and causes they are passionate about, enabling them to make a positive, meaningful impact in the lives of others. By housing a fund at the Jewish Foundation, fund-holders have the freedom to choose how they want to spend their charitable dollars without the responsibility of maintaining a private foundation.

"My grandmother always said, 'do the right thing, not the easy thing,' said Cheri. With the help of the Jewish Foundation, Reuben's birthday project was both."

Sam Hershenhorn Takes to the Streets of T.O. for the 45th Straight Year

Walk With Israel Takes Place on Victoria Day

By Daniel Horowitz

As Canadians from coast to coast celebrated Queen Victoria's birthday on Monday, May 21st, thousands of enthusiastic members of Jewish Toronto took part in UJA's Walk with Israel Family Challenge. This year's Walk marked the 45th consecutive year that this - the largest one-day Israel solidarity Walk in North America – united Jewish Toronto.

The day, which culminated with great food, games, rides and inflatables for the kids at the Renee & Irwin Nadal Festival at Ontario Place, was a tremendous success, due largely to the tireless efforts of approximately 500 men, women and children who volunteer before, during and after this Herculean event.

And the Walk with Israel just wouldn't be the same without one remarkable volunteer in particular; Toronto's own Sam Hershenhorn who, at age 86, did exactly what he's done once a year for the past 45 years - he raised an impressive amount of money which will go towards UJA's transformative projects in Israel, then he simply put on his shoes, and he walked the Walk.

To put this incredible feat into perspective, consider that Sam started this annual ritual back in 1967 which also happens to be the year we celebrated the 100-year anniversary of Canadian Confederation and, alas, the year the Toronto Maple Leafs last captured the Stanley Cup.

Sam Hershenhorn, 86, celebrates UJA's Walk With Israel along with family

Back then, Sam completed the then grueling 26-mile UJA Walkathon with his wife, Gertrude, and children. Today, in time for this year's Family Fun Challenge, Sam's close knit circle has grown to include not only his children, but his three grandchildren and one great grandchild.

"Today, the Walk is much more about community involvement, and, of course, family involvement," says Sam.

"The Walk with Israel has always been important to me and my family because it unites our Jewish community for one purpose, Israel. It also happens to combine two of my great loves, walking and helping Israel."

For Sam, the Walk is anything but a one-day event. In fact, the event consumes a good four months of his year, as he writes letters to potential donors, collects pledges and generally prepares for the day itself.

A remarkable Diaspora community such as Jewish Toronto simply doesn't "happen". It's the result of the talents and selfless efforts of people like Sam Hershenhorn.

Israeli Volunteers Bring the "Real" Israel to Toronto Youth

By Daniel Horowitz

"My job at UJA is to integrate Israel into the community using informal and formal educational and religious institutions as the primary vehicles." explains Sarah Mali, The Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI) Community Shlicha for Toronto, and UJA Fedeation's Director, Israel Engagement. And that's precisely what she's done.

Mali was charged with initiating and building UJA's MAKOM Young Emissary Program in Toronto in 2007, which brings pre-army, Israeli 18 year-olds to the city to voluntarily engage our youth, and to give them a first-hand, personal Israel education.

The program began with only two shlichim at Holy Blossom Temple and Leo Baeck Day School, and by last summer there were 14 young emissaries at over 20 community synagogues, schools, youth groups and overnight Jewish summer camps.

"These young emissaries were originally little mechanisms of change to fulfill our initial mandate of drawing more young people to shuls, and to deliver a taste of the real, unmediated Israel," says Mali. "Today, more schools and shuls realize that Israel engagement is a terrific added value for their members and today, they all have budget lines for Israel engagement programs."

While the success of the UJA MAKOM Young Emissary Program is legendary, it was still just the beginning for Mali and UJA Federation.

"We soon realized from our partnering institutions that they were looking for something broader; what we term Israel engagement which is the merging of Israel education and Jewish identity building," says Mali. "We sit on the nexus between education and identity building. We have recently started a new program called the MAKOM Institutional Change Process where we work with day schools and synagogues on a two-year process to re-envision Israel in the context of their institutions and to build a strategic plan to implement those changes. We began with young emissaries, but what we're doing today – quite successfully, I believe – is establishing a field of Israel engagement based on expertise, content, professional development and the resources and personnel that can change the face of our community ten years down the line."

Festival to celebrate Jewish life in Morocco

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

An unprecedented Canadian Jewish cultural event under the patronage of the King of Morocco will celebrate 2,000 years of Jewish life in Morocco, as well as 50 years of Canadian-Moroccan diplomatic relations.

The president of the newly established Communaute Juive Marocaine de Toronto (CJMT), Simon Keslassy, said he is thrilled to be joining with Toronto's Sephardi synagogues to present the weeklong festival which opens June 4.

Keslassy, who is part of the 16,000-strong Moroccan-Jewish community in Toronto, said Jews have maintained good relations with the largely Muslim country decades after emigrating.

"Morocco is the only country in the Arab world that recognizes Jews as Moroccan citizens," he said, adding that there are still Toronto Jews from Morocco who collect pensions from their homeland.

"That's why we have such good relations, and it is the only Arab country that does that... It was also the first country in the Arab world that recognized the Shoah."

He said King Mohammed VI met with the president of the Jewish community in Morocco last year and pledged to finance the restoration of the old cemeteries when many tzaddikim are buried.

"That's another reason we're so grateful," Keslassy said.

When he was approached by the Moroccan Embassy in Ottawa about organizing an event to celebrate the thriving relationship, Keslassy was eager to do his part.

Throughout the months-long process of organizing and programming the festival, he said he developed a rapport with the Moroccan ambassador in Ottawa, Nouzha Chekrouni.

"She's a tremendous woman," he said.

CANADA

Jews Honoured

OTTAWA — Three Jews were named to the Order of Canada on May 25, while two others were promoted within the order. Philanthropist and businessman Lawrence Bloomberg of Toronto, along with Ronald Caplan, publisher of Cape Breton's Magazine in Sydney, N.S., and diabetes researcher and clinician Dr. Bernard Zinman of Toronto are now members of the order. Philanthropist and businessman Jeff Skoll and Toronto pediatrician Alvin Zipursky were promoted to officers of the order.

Funding Opposed

TORONTO — City council's $123,000 grant to Pride Toronto was approved by the city's economic development committee last week, but councillors are expecting heated debate about the grant at June's city council meeting because the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) wants to take part in the annual Pride Parade. Mayor Rob Ford has said council shouldn't give Pride money if QuAIA marches in the parade, and centrist councillor Josh Colle said last week he agrees. Coun. James Pasternak said he expects a motion to come before council that withholds funding until after the festival, subject to conditions. QuAIA sat out last year's parade in response to controversy over its plans to march, after having marched in previous years.

Landa Honoured

HAIFA — Benny Landa, who grew up in Edmonton but in 1977 started a pioneering laser printing company in Israel that he later sold to Hewlett-Packard, will be awarded an honorary doctorate June 3 by the University of Haifa. Landa was born to Holocaust survivors in 1946 and the family came to Canada a short time later. After moving to Israel at age 30, he founded Indigo, which he later sold to HP. He then set up the Landa Corporation and has contributed money to the university to set up scholarships for underprivileged students.

Yemenite Jew Killed

SANAA — A leader of Yemen's Jewish community was stabbed to death at a market in the capital Sanaa. The victim, identified in news reports as Harun Yusuf Zindani, 50, reportedly was stabbed in the neck and stomach. He died May 22. His Muslim assailant reportedly accused him of casting a spell on him and ruining him. Some 200 to 300 Jews still live in Yemen, down from a high of 60,000. Most live in Sanaa in government housing after being evacuated from other areas of Yemen over fear for their safety. Jewish Agency for Israel chairman Natan Sharansky said Zindani was murdered for being Jewish. A Yemenite Jew was killed in Yemen in December 2008 by a Muslim man who ordered Jews to convert or be killed. The killer was sentenced to death.

Azrieli Foundation Gives YU $10 Million

David Azrieli

NEW YORK — The Azrieli Foundation made a $10-million donation to Yeshiva University in honour of foundation founder David Azrieli's 90th birthday.

The donation, the largest in the foundation's history, will go to the university's Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education and Administration. Azrieli, a Montrealer, said May 3.

The $10 million will be used mainly to offer scholarships to the school and help attract more men and women to the field of Jewish education.

"Seeing young people graduate from this school and move on to teach Judaism to the next generation has been one of my father's greatest joys," said his daughter, Naomi Azrieli, who chairs the foundation.

Azrieli, who escaped the Nazis and landed in pre-state Israel in 1942, has been a YU trustee since 1987. He studied at YU for a year.

He is the father of the modern shopping mall in Israel. He owns 14 throughout the country.

Jamaican Jews fight to save historic shul

The Shaare Shalom United Congregation of Israelites in Jamaica

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

Wilfred "Willy" Lindo remembers growing up Jewish in Jamaica.

Things have changed since Lindo, the oldest of eight brothers, each a year apart, decided at the age of 19 to leave home and move to Toronto to live with his uncle in 1966.

"Had my bar mitzvah in Jamaica – that was something special, and when I went back for a family function a few months ago, there was this overwhelming feeling that hit me after walking in to the synagogue – I was home again," recalled Lindo, a retired accountant who now spends some of his time playing piano in various senior citizen homes.

Known for its sandy white beaches and as a haven for many Canadians in the winter months, Jamaica is also home to a Jewish population that at one time was believed to be greater than 5,000, but has since dwindled to about 200 people.

Lindo said there is also great concern about what lies ahead, since there's an aging population, growing intermarriage and younger families moving to the mainland. Caring for the cemeteries, some in urgent need of repair, is another issue.

And there are more worries among Jamaican-born Jews now in Canada and the United States about the future of the one remaining synagogue on the island – one that is Reform in outlook, but a mixture of Conservative and Orthodox in tradition.

With the influx of Jews to Jamaica in the 17th century, several synagogues were constructed in Montego Bay, Spanish Town and Kingston. It's believed that in 1692, Port Royal housed the first of seven Jamaican synagogues. All but one, were destroyed by earthquakes and hurricanes.

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

Getting to know Jerusalem

From the editor's desk...

It's late May in Jerusalem. The weather is hot during the day and distinctly cooler in the evening. The sun warms and brightens. And the light at any moment during the sun's pleasant shine from the sky is brighter, clearer and somehow more illuminating to a degree that we seldom see in Montreal or Toronto.

The quality of the light in Jerusalem is one of the first things that a visitor notices about this remarkable city. The diversity of the many people who walk its streets is another.

Israelis themselves are a vastly diverse people, the blended beauty over generations of men and women who arrived here long ago or recently from almost every land on Earth.

And then there are the tourists. Tourists throng through the streets in highly visible formations like a reverse flow of lava seeking the highest, holiest spots for their ardour to cool.

They, too, come from all over the world, from every continent, speaking every language, seeking secrets, truths, fun, famous backdrops to lifelong souvenir photographs, or simply, the fulfilment of a curiosity.

Jerusalem is indeed one of the most widely imagined, obsessively sought, unique places and inspiring destinations in the world.

Thus, it is important to know Jerusalem. It is both an idea and a place.

The western literary canon, which has helped form our moral sensibilities and cultural guideposts, is quite familiar with Jerusalem as an idea.

Founded upon the Hebrew prophets' vision of an ideal society, whose hallmarks are mutual caring, mutual respect and mutual aid, the word "Jerusalem" was always an ideal for human striving. Even the late Belgian singer and songwriter, Jacques Brel, affirmed this notion of the place as an ideal when he wrote, "If we only have love, then Jerusalem stands."

But Jerusalem is also, we must remember, where some 750,000 people make their day-to-day lives in widely varying degrees of difficulty or ease, raise families, work, play and call home. It is thus in this sense, a city like every other city, where human beings reside, get along, clash, help one another, dine in, dine out, clean the streets, dirty them, collect the garbage, make more garbage, curse the traffic, curse the tax collector and curse the government.

But even more so.

For it is, after all, Jerusalem!

It is no exaggeration to write that Jerusalem is a highly kinetic place. One cannot avoid being caught up in movement in all paces, by large or small groups, by individuals silently steeped in private thought or loudly berating a friend or colleague who is not there.

The most kinetic place within this already highly kinetic city may be the Western Wall.

People visit the Wall at all hours of the day and night. Some come to the hoary, old stones out of religious need. Some come out of curiosity. Some come with expectations already formed. Some come as blank slates. Some come with a smile; others with a tear. But all who come do so with an abiding respect for the sanctity of the place

Some come to pray at the Western Wall when the very first light of day appears in the eastern sky far beyond the high stones of the ancient Wall.

Ashkenazi Jews refer to the practice as vatikin. It most likely takes its name from the fact that it was probably the older men, the seniors in the community (the vatikim) who left their homes still in the dark of predawn night to attend prayers with the first sparkle of light.

In the Sephardi world, the practice of assembling to pray immediately before the sun rises is called praying with the netz, the shard-like sharp filament of first sunlight.

Sometimes so many people, mostly men, gather for the vatikin service at the Western Wall that more than one minyan is davening simultaneously. There is no discernible order to the arrangement of people praying or leading the various discrete services.

It soon becomes a cacophony of disparate voices, accents, styles of prayer and pronunciations. Yet somehow, miraculously, out of the clamour of sounds and tumult of emotions all the minyanim arrive at the central Amidah prayer at the same time, and a stark, deep, profound silence envelopes the entirety of the Western Wall plaza, lifting the individual worshipper through soft light and cool air into a hushed, noiseless space of "no one but self," the Wall and perhaps, too, a sense of God.

The CJN was in Jerusalem last week to observe, take notes and report on life in the city and in particular on some of the countless individuals who, with the support of the Jerusalem Foundation, strive each day to make the city and the lives of its inhabitants better. Those reports will begin next week.

Festival under patronage of King of Morocco

"She told me that she was very excited about the program, and she said she would ask the Royal Palace to put this event under the patronage of the King of Morocco. This is the first time in Moroccan history that in Canada we have a festivity under the patronage of the King of Morocco."

Keslassy said similar festivals have been held in other cities around the world, including one in New York that was also endorsed by the king.

"This kind of thing has been done in the U.S., in Paris, in Brussels, in London, England, and I was approached by the American Sephardic Federation to see if we would do the same in Canada," he said.

Keslassy said the aim of the event – which runs from June 4 to 12 and is sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Sephardic Federation, Friends of the Simon Weisenthal Center and other private donors – is to educate the younger generations as well as the Ashkenazi Jewish community, about Judeo-Moroccan heritage.

Keslassy said the first event, to be held at the Sephardic Kehila Community Centre on June 4, is an exhibit that will present a traditional Mimouna, a celebration held the day after Passover that marks the return to eating chametz, as well as a lecture by Université du Québec professor David Bensoussan.

"The general community doesn't know what [Mimouna] is, so we're inviting the whole community to teach the Ashkenazis and the young generations about our traditions," Keslassy said.

The following evening marks the opening of an exhibit at York University's Glendon College featuring Judeo-Moroccan art and artifacts. The exhibit runs until June 28.

Other festival programming includes an exhibit of a traditional Judeo-Moroccan wedding, a youth conference, an interfaith conference, film screenings and a gala dinner to pay tribute to King Mohammed VI, during which the king's adviser, Andre Azoulay (who is Jewish), will address the gathering.

A student, Elmehdi Boudra, will lead the youth conference and the interfaith conference.

"That young fellow is promoting the Hebrew language in the universities in Morocco. For me, that was a big surprise," Keslassy said.

"He put together a forum in the university in Ifrane [in the Middle Atlas mountains of Morocco] about the Holocaust, and he brought in survivors from Poland and Germany and this forum was under the patronage of the King of Morocco. We were very happy that the King gave the OK to do this kind of thing in Morocco."

Keslassy said apart from the gala dinner that closes the weeklong event, all the events, which include cocktail and dessert receptions, are free.

"We did that on purpose so more people will come, will learn about our traditions and give them an opportunity to taste our food," he said.

"We're doing this for the young generations, because we have come to the time when the young generation will take over for us and we want them to remember."

Torontonians take to streets to Walk with Israel

More than 15,000 people took to the streets of downtown Toronto on Victoria Day to show their support for the Jewish state at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual Walk With Israel. The sunny skies made for great walking conditions along a path that started on Toronto's waterfront and ended with food and attractions at Ontario Place. Donations are estimated to total a record-breaking $600,000, which will benefit the needy in Israeli cities such as Sderot, Eilat, Eilot and Bat Yam.

Racism rejected

The government of Israel is working methodically and quickly to build a fence on its mostly unfenced border with the Sinai. There are valid security reasons for doing so, especially in light of the hostile Hamas rulers in Gaza who employ a cadre of smugglers and other cutthroats near that vulnerable area for purposes inimical to the Jewish state.

But there is another very urgent reason for Israel's fence-building on the Sinai border. It was reported on Israeli television last week that hundreds of thousands of migrants from the Horn of Africa, mostly from Sudan, are said to be on their way to Israel, a long line of humanity looking to escape the utter poverty, destitution and disease of their homeland for the possibility of sanctuary, if not new beginning, in Israel. At considerable reward, Bedouins smuggle the human cargo into Israel. At all costs, they avoid the Egyptian security forces, for they know the Egyptians shoot the smugglers and the migrants.

It is estimated that some 1,000 illegal migrants cross the Sinai into Israel each month. More than 50,000 such migrants are already in Israel. Most live in the poor neighbourhoods of south Tel Aviv.

In the wake of a recent wave of violent crime in Tel Aviv, some of the city's residents have grown uncomfortable with the presence of so large a number of illegal immigrants in their midst and with the lack of any government policy for dealing with the migrant influx.

A demonstration last week in south Tel Aviv against the illegal migrants became violent. Some protesters attacked migrants. Some smashed the windshield of a car carrying three migrants. Some set trash bins on fire. Some threw firecrackers at police and shouted ugly nasty epithets at the Africans and at the government. Some of the nastiest epithets, alas, came from two Knesset members. One referred to the illegal migrants as a plague. The second called them a cancer.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu responded quickly and condemned the violence. "There is no place for the expressions or the actions that we witnessed last night."

But he also acknowledged that the status quo cannot continue. "The migrant problem must be resolved, and we will resolve it. We will complete construction on the fence [along the Egyptian-Israeli border] within a few months, and soon we will begin returning the migrants to their countries of origin."

Israel is in a quandary. It faces a social and security problem of immense proportion. To its credit, however, it has resolved to find a solution that is based upon pragmatic recourse, humanitarian considerations, regard for the legitimate fears of its citizens, the application of the rule of law and a complete and utter rejection of racism, prejudice and bigotry.

Leaders of 23 national U.S. Jewish groups strongly protested to Israeli leaders and key MKs against any political deal that would give Israel's Chief Rabbinate sole authority to judge the validity of conversions performed in the Diaspora. They were responding to reports prime minister Yitzhak Shamir had promised such a legal amendment to the haredi Shas party.

The Yavneh student movement

It was with great interest that I read Martin Lockshin's review of Benny Kraut's new book on the Yavneh student movement of the 1960s, The Greening of American Orthodox Judaism: Yavneh in the 1960s ("History of Orthodox student group captures the vibrancy of the 1960s," May 17). It brought back vividly those days I spent on the Barnard-Columbia campus when Rabbi Yitz Greenberg collected a group of students to found the Yavneh organization. At the time, a program to ease the life of religiously observant Jews on campus was a major breakthrough, both spiritually and logistically.

However, there is one historical point that was missing. The students who gravitated to Yavneh came from New York homes that were often Orthodox but also what I choose to call old time Conservative, that is, shomer Shabbat and observant of kashrut. When it came time to choose the official name for the newborn organization, especially when letterheads had to be printed, there were some heated arguments. A group of us maintained that the term "Orthodox" would be too exclusive and we requested that a term like "religiously observant Jews" should replace it. Many of us were studying at the Jewish Theological Seminary and so described ourselves. A compromise was reached by naming Yavneh a "Jewish Religious Students Association." I no longer have in my possession any of the early Yavneh mailings or publications, but I do know that the term Orthodox was not part of the official name of that wonderful student organization.

At the same time, I am well aware that times have changed and understand, for better or worse, why "Orthodox" is now the accepted designation.

Anti-Israel boycotters

I was astonished to read "Les combats pro-Israël d'Éric Duhaime" (April 26, http://bit.ly/KCmL1x). I find Duhaime's commitment to Israel praiseworthy, but with respect to the anti-Israel boycotters on St. Denis in Montreal, he appears to be misinformed. The article quotes him as saying that the boycotters had suffered a resounding defeat, yet nothing could be further from the truth.

I am the owner of the Naot shoe store on St. Denis. My store has been the target of the anti-Israel boycotters for more than a year and a half. Every Saturday, many passersby avoid the area in front of the store when they see the large black banners and Palestinian flags. My business and those of my neighbours have been severely affected by this ongoing harassment, resulting in the loss of jobs.

One would do well to ask why Duhaime and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, whose members he quotes, appear to celebrate such a situation. In reality, it was precisely at the moment in June 2011, when the boycotters began to focus on my shop, that CIJA began claiming that "victory" had been achieved. To proclaim victory at the very moment when the boycotters began to unrelentingly harass a boutique that carries almost exclusively Israeli products seems to be a rather strange way to support Israel.

Fortunately, a large group of Quebecers, many of them non-Jews, provide my shop and the other affected businesses with strong and loyal support every week. These Amis Québécois d'Israël, as they call themselves, help by reducing the potential harm caused by the boycotters and they appeal to the public to buy in my shop and those of my neighbours. Their active presence prevents the boycotters from monopolizing the space in front of our stores.

The motorcycle rider

I am looking for a man whose last name may have been Greenberg and who would have been about 16 to 25 years old in 1930-32. He rode an Indian Chief Motorcycle, which was not too common around 1932, and may have been interested in the theatre or worked in the theatre, especially vaudeville shows. He likely lived in downtown Montreal. I am hoping that someone will read this and recall a grandparent who may fit this description. Maybe they knew someone who was Jewish and in the 1930s owned a motorcycle. I would appreciate hearing from anyone who has any information.

The techinah and the Titanic

Gloria Lidsky Fuerstenberg
Special to The CJN

On April 14, the last day of Passover 2012, like many Jews the world over I attended synagogue services. The Yizkor prayer of remembrance for the dead is a hallmark of this occasion. Included in the siddur are prayers for the souls of our departed parents and other family members, for those individuals who were murdered in the Holocaust, for people who perished in defence of the State of Israel and for the victims of terror.

What made this day different from all other days was the fact that it coincided exactly with the 100th anniversary of the sinking of the Titanic. In my hands, along with a siddur, I held a small, unique Yiddish prayerbook called a techinah (or tkhine, in Yiddish). In it were many prayers, including one to be recited for the memory of people who had drowned in rivers or at sea and, most dramatically for me on that specific date, for those who had died in the Titanic disaster.

I was stunned by a paragraph extolling the humanitarian virtues of Ida and Isidor Straus, a prominent German Jewish American couple in their 60s who went down with the ship. It read: "They had done much good in their life, going hand in hand to help the poor and downtrodden, to aid the elderly, the sick and the weak, and who were united in their death. 'Where you go, I will go,' said the noble woman to her husband, and she refused to save herself knowing that her husband would be drowned." (My translation.)

Straus, the founder and co-owner of Macy's department store in New York City, had also served as a member of the U.S. House of Representatives and was a noted philanthropist. According to surviving eyewitnesses whose names and statements are on record, including that of Ida Straus's personal maid, a Miss Ellen Bird who boarded the lifeboat at their insistence, the couple chose to stay on the ship, he refusing to enter the lifeboat because there were still women and children who had not yet been evacuated, and she declaring her intention to stay with her husband to the end.

Last seen by passengers and crew who were already on Lifeboat 8, they sat calmly on deck chairs, holding hands. Ida Straus's body was never found. Isidor's remains were retrieved days later by the ship C.S. Mackay-Bennet from Halifax and were buried at Woodlawn Cemetery in the Bronx, N.Y.

The Titanic had set sail during one of the largest waves of Jewish immigration to the United States from eastern Europe, between 1881 and 1924. The majority of Jewish passengers, in third class, were refugees fleeing the dangers of European life such as pogroms and the three-year conscription into the Russian army, described by some as an ongoing pogrom "only much longer and much more painful" for Jewish soldiers because of rampant antisemitism.

Uniquely, the Titanic was the first great ocean liner to do away with steerage class and, as a result, many third-class passengers were treated to service and food they had never experienced. Apparently the White Star Line made a larger profit per head from third-class tickets and hoped that word of good treatment would spread and business would increase. Passengers in first class included those who, like the Strauses, were returning to America from vacations and business trips abroad or were immigrating with their families and household staff.

White Star, Cunard and German lines had separate kosher kitchen facilities by 1912, with meat and milk dishes and silverware identified as such in English and Hebrew, and kosher food available in all classes for those requesting it. These meals were instituted as the result of "a request from a number of Jewish organizations" and the fact that, according to an article in the Washington Post of Nov. 2, 1909, a young Jewish woman of 18 had died of starvation on arrival in Ellis Island by ship because she refused to eat non-kosher food.

The name of the special "Hebrew cook" of the Titanic was Charles Kennell, listed as 30 years of age. Of the 2,225 passengers, he was one of the 1,512 who did not survive. Religious supervision of the provisions on the Titanic was provided by the rabbi of Southampton, who also trained Kennell as a kosher supervisor.

My tkhine was printed in New York in 1916 by the Hebrew Publishing Company, just four years after the sinking of the ship, and this heroic episode was still fresh in peoples' minds. Its particular prayer of remembrance for the Strauses is the only one out of the 176 to mention any contemporary, i.e non-biblical, individuals by name.

The 314-page volume had been purchased by my widowed maternal grandmother, Gittel Gorodetsky, soon after her arrival in Montreal by ship in 1926, from Beltz, Bessarabia, with her two youngest children, my mother, then a girl of 14, and my Uncle Reuben, 6. It was used for prayer daily by her and subsequently by my mother, Fanny Lidsky, of blessed memory. When my mother passed away in 1999, I started to explore this small volume as comfort, connection and consolation. My own day school (yeshiva) education had been in Hebrew, but I was able to read the Yiddish (luckily it had punctuation) and understand most of it.

What I discovered was a treasure of Jewish women's thought and piety that truly reflected the innermost concerns of the women who composed and wrote them down. The word techinah, from Hebrew, means entreaty, supplication for favour, a request for the Almighty to be gracious. It also refers to the collections of such requests that had been compiled originally into small printed pamphlets and later into volumes used by Ashkenazi women in central and eastern Europe for private devotion from the 17th century on. The rise of printing in that era also saw women involved in production as printers, translators and even typesetters.

Structurally, each individual prayer begins with a heading directing when and sometimes how it should be recited (e.g. "Upon arising" or "With great devotion"). The first few words of every prayer in the techinah are in Hebrew in the somewhat impersonal language of the siddur, followed by a supplication in Yiddish in a woman's voice addressed directly to God as one would speak to a loving father. This form is used for every occasion in a woman's life, both domestic and in the synagogue – lighting the Sabbath candles, baking challah for Shabbat, blessing the new month (Rosh Chodesh) and hearing the shofar. Every day of the week has its own distinct private devotions.

What I found meaningful are the specific requests for heavenly protection for children or relatives in a war (remember this edition was printed during World War I), upon hearing bad news from the "Alter Velt" (Old World, or Europe), and for the souls of victims of fire and pogroms. There are also supplications to be read by an agunah (one whose husband refuses to give her a Jewish divorce and who therefore cannot remarry), by a woman who is being supported by her children – this is before social security when many elderly women had no personal resources and had to live with married children – and for a woman to meditate on before going out to collect charity on behalf of the needy. It expresses her fervent wish that she not, "Heaven forbid," shame someone who cannot afford to give money nor somehow inadvertently embarrass the recipients of the charity.

This edition of the tkhine is unique because, having been published in 20th-century America, it reflects some of the guilt associated with breaking the commandment to honour the Sabbath. Employed in garment industry sweatshops to support their families, immigrants to America almost always had to work on Saturdays, even though it was against their religious beliefs. After begging for divine forgiveness on behalf of her husband and herself for this unwilling transgression, the reader prays for a better future in which economic security would allow them to once again honour the Sabbath completely.

The beauty of the language and the directness of expression in the tkhines are a testament to the literacy, intelligence and piety of Jewish women through the ages.

No, McGill is not antisemitic

An e-mail sent to me and copied to McGill's principal Heather Munroe-Blum grabbed my attention. It contained a forwarded article headlined "McGill University's Rampant, Historic, and Current Anti-Semitism," which concluded that "Antisemitism is clearly engrained into the culture at McGill University, and any proud Jew wouldn't go anywhere near the university."

Gil Troy

in Montreal

As a proud Jew associated with the university for more than 20 years, knowing that it is led by another proud Jew whose first public letter to the McGill community eloquently denounced antisemitism, I thought the issue required investigation.

The article's author certainly had grounds for being furious. The trigger was an outrageous smear in the McGill Daily that ran this past March calling Israel "The Land of Milk and Heroin." This latest anti-Israel libel accused the Jewish state of encouraging heroin addiction among Palestinians, especially in Jerusalem. This article belongs to a genre we can call "Israel as bogeyman," which seeks to blame the Jewish state for any problem even vaguely associated with the Middle East or Israel's existence. Such delegitimization and hatred reeks of antisemitism, with its extremism and essentialism.

The version of the article I read online was already sanitized, shorn of its most offensive statements, thanks to the effective response of Michelle Whiteman, Quebec regional director of HonestReporting Canada. As she explained in a Times of Israel blog entry, HonestReporting confronted the Daily, and even though the paper only ran a heavily edited letter from HonestReporting six weeks later, it cleaned up the article online, partially.

Gone were such absurd, unfounded libels, based on "Palestine TV's arguments," that "Israeli authorities are actually responsible for encouraging and facilitating heroin use among Arabs for political reasons." Still, pathetic, inaccurate faux anthropological insights abounded, such as the claim that "drug abuse is often found burgeoning in regions facing political conflict, with rates of addiction rising during times of both physical and structural conflict – it is seen as being a defence strategy to cope with insecurity and violence." How this "insight" explains the spike in heroin addiction during the prosperous 1960s in the West or the fact that Israeli Jews and Arabs have similar rates of heroin addiction – except among Arab women, where it plummets – is beyond me.

Still, while the article was heavily biased against Israel, and while I understand the historic resonance of antisemitism fuelling such smears, and while I recoil from the blatant antisemitism in the Arab world that is now, to my horror, shaping the conversation on too many college campuses, that does not make McGill an antisemitic institution.

For starters, the McGill Daily is known on campus for frequently running shoddy, provocative, extreme, "politically correct" articles. Despite being a professor who rarely turns away from a good ideological battle, I won't lower myself to responding to Daily articles. I was thrilled that HonestReporting did – although I wish McGill students themselves had done it, as some did in the online comments. Second, the Daily is a student-run publication that does not represent McGill University in any way. Finally, McGill has a thriving Jewish student life, many Jewish students, professsors and administrators, a first-rate Judaic studies department, an impressive Hillel, and an exciting, student-run Ghetto shul – attributes that make it one of the most welcoming campuses for Jews.

The bigger issue here is the shrillness of debate about Israel. Again and again, so many of Israel's opponents seem utterly incapable of making a nuanced argument when it comes to the Middle East. Israel is demonized in multiple ways worldwide. In response, I regret to say, some of Israel's defenders also overreact. When our allies in the fight for Israel unfairly call an institution such as McGill "antisemitic," we all suffer. It undermines our credibility. When I have seen antisemitism, I have fought it, passionately, and have the professional scars to show for it. But when I see false and extreme accusations, even when I understand the pain underlying it, I also have to respond.

And let me be clear: my response is not only tactical, made because we might look bad. We need to set the highest standards for the pro-Israel community, demanding truth, consistency, nuance and accuracy. Hysteria hurts us, distracting us from the real issues and the bigger problems. It also alienates us from our environment unnecessarily, blinding us to potential allies and even to true friends.

Why a shul?

Two people having a conversation on a Saturday morning at home: "Get out of bed and go to shul!" "But I don't want to go to shul. I'm tired. I don't like the cantor's singing. And I don't have any friends in the congregation. Give me one good reason why I have to go to shul." "Because you're the rabbi."

I was moved by Avrum Rosensweig's column in last month's CJN about community. He hit the nail squarely on the head when he wrote, "If you don't belong, consider it. It can be exasperating, but highly soothing in a life where our existential anguish can throb like a sore ligament."

I don't know if I would choose the word soothing for synagogue life. Ever been to a soothing shul board meeting? I don't think shul should be an elixir for all that ails us. In fact, shul should challenge us and vex our otherwise cozy existence. (As my old homiletics teacher once said, "Our job is to comfort the afflicted and afflict the comfortable.") But Rosensweig is certainly right that belonging plays a huge part in shrinking the existential disconnect that so many of us feel so much of the time.

As I reported in February, I've returned to the congregational rabbinate after 20 years. But I never explained why. Why shul? (Notice I didn't say, "Why my shul?" Too many of us are territorial about memberships. Oh, for the good old days in the shtetl, when you paid one set of dues into the community coffers and got the rabbi of your choice, a burial plot in the community Jewish cemetery, and the ability to go to all of the shuls that benefited from those coffers. Sigh.)

So, why shul?

• Eric Yoffie, past president of the Union for Reform Judaism, writes, "The synagogue is the only place in the Jewish world that can be counted on to care about the individual Jew." We're all searching for a sense of community that takes us offline. The synagogue may be one of the only places where each of us is expected to move beyond "I." Shuls speak in "we" more than "I". In a society that values individual productivity, and where "team" is mostly a metaphor for well-paid individuals trying to work together to stay well-paid, many of us choose to stay away from a place that pretty well requires us to sacrifice for the collective good. Those who don't belong are missing a rare chance to be in a "we" with others who have also chosen to speak in "we."

• The synagogue may be the only place an adult is expected to continue learning things that aren't connected to their work and don't help them "get ahead": Torah for Torah's sake, new tunes, how to lift a Torah scroll, the history of the Jews of Spain, Hebrew, mysticism, the Maccabees. There are no professional credits, no incentives other than knowledge. Those who don't belong often get stuck in a 13-year old's level of Jewish knowledge and understanding. They may never meet the sophisticated adult system of Judaism and can't even answer the simple questions of their friends and neighbours.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

• Other than your therapist, your rabbi is the only professional paid to care about you, pay attention to you, ask about your life and listen carefully to the answer, visit you when you're sick, hold your hand when you lose a loved one, inquire about your kids, or notice when you've lost your way. Those who don't belong get a rabbi parachuted into their life for a few precious moments on a fee-per-service basis, no different than a florist or a caterer.

• The synagogue is the place you can be spiritual and not be embarrassed by it, or be non-spiritual and enjoy others being spiritual. It's a place where meaning really matters, where big questions are asked, where depth is the norm, where large ideas are debated in a friendly way, where your voice and your vote really can change the way things work. It's a place you can be "touchy-feely" or intellectual, philosophical or political, passionate about things that others may think are wimpy.

If you don't belong, there isn't much space in society for your soul, except maybe at your yoga class. But does your yoga class give you everything else I've mentioned, and will they be there when you want a minyan to say Kaddish?

The Holocaust in North Africa

The Holocaust was not strictly "a European story." Robert Satloff correctly states in his important book, Among the Righteous: Lost Stories From the Holocaust's Long Reach Into Arab Lands, published by Public Affairs.

With the fall of France in 1940, the consolidation of Vichy rule in Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia and Libya, and Germany's invasion of North Africa, the lives of some 500,000 Jews were suddenly imperilled.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"Virtually no Jew in North Africa was left untouched," writes Satloff.

As the Holocaust rolled over Jews in Europe, North African Jews were deprived of citizenship, property, education and livelihood, sent to forced labour camps and subjected to confiscations, deportations and executions.

"Still many more (Jews) lived in a state of perpetual fear and daily privation," he adds.

By his estimate, 4,000 to 5,000 North African Jews perished, while 1,200 North African Jews trapped in France were deported to Nazi death camps in Poland.

"If Allied troops had not driven the Germans from the African continent in 1943, two years before the fall of Berlin, then the 2,000-year-old Jewish communities of Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya, and perhaps Egypt and Palestine, too, would almost certainly have met the fate of their brethren in Europe."

The fate of Jews in North Africa was sealed with Germany's conquest of France in 1940. In Algeria, a French overseas colonial possession, the Vichy regime annulled the Cremieux decree, which had given Jews the opportunity to become citizens of France. In one fell stroke, 105,000 Algerian Jews lost their French citizenship.

According to Satloff, the cancellation of the Cremieux decree was not made in response to German pressure.

At almost the exact moment, Moroccan and Tunisian Jews lost most of their civil, legal and personal rights under the statut des juifs, which, like Germany's Nuremberg laws, defined Jewishness.

The statut des juifs, which was also applied in France, were all-encompassing, prohibiting Jews from holding governmental or military positions and jobs in the professions.

Vichy France issued a more severe version in 1941 that limited Jewish enrolment at schools and universities and forced Jews to sell businesses and property.

During this period, Algerian Jews suffered the most. The situation in Morocco and Tunisia was marginally less onerous. In Morocco, however, Jews bore the brunt of a special edict that compelled them to move back to the mellah, the congested ghetto.

The Moroccan king, Muhammed V, did not share the pro-German sympathies of the Arab elite of the day, and was particularly appalled that Vichy's anti-Jewish laws were based on race, he writes.

According to Satloff, the German occupation of Tunisia, which lasted from November 1942 to May 1943, was "a Hobbesian experience, nasty, brutish and short."

Although Germany's occupation force was constantly under attack by Allied armies, the Nazis managed to torment the Jewish population, taking hostages, stealing property, extorting ransoms, dispatching thousands to labour camps and killing prisoners.

King Muhammed V of Morocco

As in Europe, Tunisian Jews were required to wear the demeaning yellow Star of David and Jewish councils were compelled to implement Nazi policies.

In Tunis, German soldiers broke into the Great Synagogue, brutalizing men and women. On the island of Djerba, home to one of the oldest Jewish communities in the Diaspora, the Germans demanded a huge ransom.

Throughout Tunisia, 5,000 Jews were sent to 40 labour camps, some controlled by the Italian occupation army.

Conditions were appalling, yet Jews who found themselves in the Italian zone usually received better treatment. "In general," Satloff writes, "Italian soldiers lacked the antisemitic zeal of their German allies ..."

By his reckoning, 2,575 Tunisian Jews died during the German occupation, the majority in Allied bombing raids.

Arabs played a "supporting role" in the persecution of Jews, he says. Some notables, for example, tried to improve their personal finances and political fortunes at the expense of Jews.

Arab mobs, especially in Tunisia, went on rampages. Upward of 13,000 Arab men volunteered for the German army. In only one instance was an Arab arrested, tried, convicted and sentenced to prison for having collaborated with foreign forces in the persecution of Jews.

"There may have been others," he notes, "but their stories are either locked away in the archives of French military tribunals, which remain closed for 100 years, or have been lost with the passage of time."

Amid instances of Arab collaboration, Satloff stumbled upon "gestures of sympathy" by Arabs.

As he puts it, "At every stage of the Nazi, Vichy and fascist persecutions of Jews in Arab lands, and in every place that it occurred, Arabs helped Jews. Some Arabs spoke out against the persecution of Jews and took public stands of unity with them. Some Arabs denied the support and assistance that would have made the wheels of the anti-Jewish campaign spin more efficiently. Some Arabs shared the fate of Jews... And there were occasions when certain Arabs chose to do more than just offer moral support to Jews. They bravely saved Jewish lives, at times risking their own in the process. Those Arabs were true heroes."

Citing such cases, Satloff tells of the "fair and exemplary" attitude of Arabs in the Tunisian city of Sfax and in the hinterland and of imams in Algiers who urged local Muslims not to take advantage of Jews for financial gain.

Satloff also praises Si Kaddour Benghabrit, the imam of the Great Mosque of Paris. He saved the life of Salim (Simon) Halali, an Algerian-born Jew who became France's most celebrated "Oriental" singer.

When Halali was in real danger of being deported, he turned to Benghabrit, one of his fans. Benghabrit supplied him with a certificate of Muslim identity, which enabled Halali to survive the war.

Despite instances of Arab generosity, the vast majority of Arabs displayed "glacial indifference" to Jewish suffering, Satloff concludes.

Satloff also examines Arab attitudes on the Holocaust, contending that "Holocaust minimization" is widespread in the Arab media and in Arab scholarship today.

In addition, he delves into several other topics – the strange phenomenon in which Moroccan and Tunisian Jews play down or ignore the wartime era in their respective countries, the reason why Yad Vashem has yet to honour a single Arab who helped Jews during the Holocaust, and Germany's decision, in May 2005, to pay compensation to North African Holocaust survivors.

Academics dissect modern antisemitism

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Traditional forms of Jew-hatred are fuelling the rhetoric of contemporary anti-Zionists, two scholars of modern antisemitism contend.

Presenting their theories at a May 15 seminar at Beth Tzedec Congregation titled "Anti-Zionism and Antisemitism: The Blurry Red Line?" professors Catherine Chatterley, director of the Canadian Institute for the Study of Antisemitism in Winnipeg, and David Hirsh, a lecturer in sociology at the University of London's Goldsmiths' College, discussed antisemitism's origins and argued that the boycott movement against Israel and the emergence of "Israeli apartheid week" on North American campuses, for example, are new forms of classic antisemitism.

The event, attended by about 250 people, was organized by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Father Raymond de Sousa, a National Post columnist and CIJA board member, moderated.

Chatterley talked about the historic evolution of antisemitism, noting how from medieval times to the 20th century, the caricature of "the Jew" – the payes-wearing, hook-nosed, money-laundering, conniving, in-league-with-the-Devil manipulator and controller of power – was a prominent image in European Christendom stemming from the "rancorous divorce between Judaism and Christianity."

The image embedded itself in the Christian psyche.

"Jews were systematically excluded by Christians and then marginalized," she said. "It was the theology of the Church during the high Middle Ages that helped develop antisemitism."

Catherine Chatterley

Chatterley, who was raised a Lutheran, told The CJN she became interested in Jewish issues after hearing about the Holocaust as a child. "It was a shattering experience and became a lifelong passion to try to understand" antisemitism, she said.

She said older forms of antisemitism have been co-opted by anti-Zionists, but that it was the Nazis who exported this vision of Jews to the Arab world, and it was followed by Soviet anti-Zionist rhetoric during the Cold War.

Since then, most Arabs' views of Jews and Israel have been laced with antisemitism, whereas before, Arab attitudes grew out of land disputes.

Chatterley said that classic European antisemitism "has been Islamicized and is now part of the culture on the ground" in the Arab world.

"For the first time in history, antisemitism has spread outside of Christian circles," she said. "In 2012, no one wants to be an antisemite, but progressives… are blurring the lines. One wonders if the definition of antisemitism should be expanded to include new forms. 'The Jew' has unfortunately found a place in the Arab world.

"All antisemites see themselves as the victims of 'the Jew.' It is a concept we must fight against."

In his talk, Hirsh spoke of his struggle and that of English Jewry to prevent England's University and College Union (UCU), Britain's largest trade union for academics and lecturers, from adopting an academic boycott of Israel.

He said UCU leaders refuse to listen to him and like-minded peers when they object to antisemitic guests the union invites to speak to its members.

Hirsh added that while many people think UCU is the de facto voice of mainstream intellectuals, it's really the voice of a small number of activists that the intellectuals "couldn't be bothered" to stop.

"You can take over a union with 100 activists. Once you do, it's quite difficult to stop, unless you have 100 people willing to devote their lives to it, and we don't," he said, referring to pro-Israel academics in Britain.

Hirsh said that on the whole, his country is a good place for Jews to live, but in academic circles, there is "a problem in the chattering classes on the left.

"This is not insignificant, as we teach children and become journalists," he said.

The antisemitic venom he's heard from fellow professors and instructors at British universities in casual conversation has shocked him, he said.

Similarly, the widespread adoption of anti-Zionist positions by British academics – Chatterley said this is also happening in Canada – is worrisome, Hirsh said.

"Antisemites have always understood Jews to be the centre of evil in the world," Hirsh said. "Anti-Zionists feel the same about Israel."

The hardest part of fighting modern antisemitism is that it comes from people who say they oppose antisemitism, Hirsh said. "They don't understand what they're doing."

Chatterley added: "There is a definite perspective in progressive circles, academic or not, that antisemitism is simply a form of racism, and because Jews are not largely excluded socially, economically or politically, the way they had been… that antisemitism really isn't a problem."

That's why the world focuses on other injustices, such as native issues in Canada or people of colour or the Palestinians, she said.

The world feels it needs to deal with people who are "actually suffering," and the perception is that Jews are not, Chatterley said.

"I think this is a widely accepted perspective, which is why there's an enormous resentment when one mentions antisemitism. It's seen as a red herring, because it's not perceived as a problem today," she said.

Asked whether the world might be seeing the start of a new cycle of antisemitism that could lead to the persecution of Jews the West, Chatterley said she believes it's possible.

With antisemitism and anti-Zionism rising, it's causing fear and consternation among Jews, and particularly among Jewish educators and academics, she said.

"They may not talk about this publicly, but I've had discussions with friends who study antisemitism, and the talk of the fear of a second Holocaust is very real, whether well founded or not," she said.

"Jews have every right to be fearful as far as I'm concerned. Given the genocidal rhetoric coming out of Iran and its dismissal in academic circles, the fear is well founded."

Hirsh said he's wary of using the Holocaust to measure antisemitism, as he believes it was a unique occurrence.

"If we only ever look for the Holocaust, we'll miss what's happening [with antisemitism] right now," he said.

Chatterley said her institute is trying to establish a degree in antisemitism studies, which would be the first of its kind in the world.

'Hungarian' day centre welcomes all seniors

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

A group of men and women, many of whom come from Hungarian backgrounds, get together three times a week to socialize, play cards and enjoy special events.

They meet Tuesdays, Thursdays and Sundays from 11:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. at the New Horizon Day Centre for Seniors, at 3565 Bathurst St. in Toronto, across from Baycrest.

More than 15,000 people from Hungary and the surrounding countries live in the Toronto area.

Erika Soptei, who is a volunteer manager of the day centre with George Kulcsar, says, "We have a kosher lunch prepared on the premises and refreshments, and we have special holiday celebrations with live music and outings. Many of our outings are subsidized."

Kulcsar says, "We have the best matzah ball soup every Sunday for lunch. Although we are mostly of Hungarian backgrounds, everyone is welcome.

"You could say we are of mixed backgrounds, for some of us are married to Canadians."

Originally, explains Soptei, all the members of the day centre were Jewish. "When we asked for funds from the Ontario government, we are now open to everyone. The only requirement is that you must be 65 years old or more.

"As volunteers, we devote a great deal of time planning and organizing the club," she adds.

She says that non-members can drop in for $3 a day, and food is extra. There is free parking and a bus stop close to the door, notes George Stern, a spokesperson for the day centre.

"It is wonderful for seniors to remain active and to have social friends," Soptei says. "This is what we provide at the club. Friendship is very important."

For more information about the day centre, drop in or call 416-256-1892 during the centre's hours.

Shaviv leaves CHAT for New York school

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Paul Shaviv is leaving the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto after 14 years as its director of education.

He will become head of school at the Ramaz School in Manhattan, a modern Orthodox day school that runs from nursery to Grade 12.

Paul Shaviv

Although he said he would have been happy to continue at TanenbaumCHAT in a role he describes as "a dream job for any Jewish educator," Shaviv said he believes the school "will benefit from fresh blood and fresh ideas."

On a personal level, Shaviv has strong incentive to move, given his marriage in January 2011. His wife, Michelle, is an American who lives in Florida and New York, and they've had "a commuting existence."

Shaviv's first wife, Judy, died of cancer in 2008.

The job opening at Ramaz, where the current head of school is retiring, was "a big opportunity," Shaviv told The CJN. "Ramaz is regarded as sort of the flagship Jewish high school" in New York and in the United States as well, he said.

"I'm very much looking forward to it."

Shaviv believes he's accomplished "most of what I'm going to do" at TanenbaumCHAT, referring to achievements such as opening the school's second campus in 2000, doubling the size of its student population to almost 1,400, and developing the Wallenberg (south) campus, which recently broke ground for a new $7.5-million science wing.

The growth of the school, in addition to being a career highlight for Shaviv, also brought management-related challenges.

"It's a testament to the strength of the school that we got through that period without real crisis," he said.

Shaviv credited his team of lay and professional leaders for working together when challenges arose.

He said he regrets that the demands of managing the school's growth took him out of the classroom five years ago. Until that time, he taught Jewish history and Jewish philosophy.

"I probably became a fairly distant figure to students and even to some teachers. Running the school was a huge job."

A second regret is that he was "never able to implement my vision of having a vocational training stream in the school, which would have made the Jewish high school experience accessible to a much larger number of students who are presently disenfranchised by our community – kids who would be heading to the workplace on graduating high school."

At 63, he said he is "absolutely not ready to retire."

A native of London, England, Shaviv is an alumnus of both Cambridge and Oxford universities. A recipient of the prestigious Max M. Fisher Prize for Jewish Education in the Diaspora in 2009, he is the author of The Jewish High School: a Complete Management Guide and has been a Jewish school administrator on three continents, including a four-year stint in Montreal before he moved to Toronto.

Rhona Birenbaum, TanenbaumCHAT's CFO/executive director, will be the school's interim director of education for the coming year.

Pride service to be inclusive

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Congregation Shir Libeynu will be gearing up for Toronto's annual Pride Week with a special Shabbat service on June 2 that honours "queer Jews, our allies, and the people we love," the shul's website said.

Aviva Goldberg, the spiritual leader of Shir Libeynu, a Toronto liberal, inclusive, egalitarian and unaffiliated shul, said this will be the sixth annual LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered and questioning) Pride service the congregation has held, but isn't totally comfortable calling it a "pride-themed" service.

"We've always had a problem with calling it a pride-themed service because right from our inception, we've been inclusive. I don't like the term gay-friendly. It's nice to be friendly to everybody and everybody is, but we are more than just that," Goldberg said.

"We've always been inclusive. Our members are from all denominations of Judaism, as well as all sexual orientations."

Aviva Goldberg

Shir Libeynu, which will be celebrating its 16th year on Rosh Hashanah, holds Shabbat services on the first Saturday morning of each month in the Michael Bernstein Chapel in Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

She explained that for the past six years, the Shabbat service that runs in advance of Pride Week (June 22 to July 1) focuses on the diverse Jewish LBGTQ population.

The service is based on an Eit Ratzon siddur, a transliterated text that focuses on the meaning of the prayers and incorporates readings from other texts.

"There is a great deal of participation. Different people recite the readings, and the dvar Torah that will be read at this service will specifically focus on inclusivity, and the fact that Judaism is open, we believe, to everybody," Goldberg said.

"Many of our readings are adapted from a variety of siddurim – for example one called Sha'ar Zahav – which the gay-lesbian synagogue in San Francisco put together."

Goldberg said the service is different each year. "I happen to be a professor at York University and my work has to do with religious studies, so that allows me to do a lot of research that is both for my work at the university and for the synagogue."

She said she just read a book called Keep Your Wives Away from Them: Orthodox Women, Unorthodox Desires from which she'll pull excerpts to be read during the service.

In addition to the readings, the service will also incorporate music, which will be led by singer-songwriter Daniela Gesundheit, who doubles as Shir Libeynu's cantor.

Goldberg, who has been the spiritual leader since the shul's inception, said that while Shir Libeynu may not be affiliated with the mainstream Jewish denominations, the fact that the congregation has multiplied over the years is evidence that it fills a need in the Jewish community.

"We started out with about 75 people who came to our services... There are now about 300 who come to our High Holiday services," she said. "We're a congregation of people who want to be at shul, and we feel comfortable in all aspects of our lives. I mean that from a sense of pride, but I also mean that they can be all of who they are when they come to the synagogue."

Trying to preserve Jamaica's Jewish heritage

The one that lives on, the historic Shaare Shalom United Congregation of Israelites, also known as the Duke Street Synagogue, remains in downtown Kingston. It may not be the oldest in the Caribbean, however. Historians claim that two synagogues are believed to be older than the one in Jamaica – the Mikvé Israel-Emanuel in Curaçao and Nidhe Israel in Barbados.

Turnouts for Sabbath services at Duke Street are now not a concern. But Lindo and his younger cousin, Charles Hendricks, who also left for Canada, know all too well about the dwindling Jewish community in the land of their birth.

"Sure, it's a concern and the cost to keep a rabbi is one thing, but the cost of not having one can be a bigger problem," said Lindo, who is a board member of Toronto's Pride of Israel Synagogue.

Lindo has organized a brunch and dance on June 17 at Pride of Israel hoping to raise donations to send to Jamaica. Cost is $36. The event, with close to 200 people already attending, is open to the public. Those interested can contact Pride of Israel at 416-226-0111 for more information or call Lindo at 416-347-9297.

Constructed in 1912 and replacing an earlier building destroyed by a devastating storm, the Jamaican synagogue has a beautiful Dutch and Portuguese architecture with a white exterior. A powdery white sandy floor and classic mahogany woodwork encompass the interior of the building.

Ashkenazi and Sephardi communities united over time, and two lights burn on either side of the synagogue's Ark symbolizing the merge. There are also 16 scrolls, some of them more than 200 years old and from former Jamaican and Caribbean synagogues.

Some Jamaican Jews share stories about the Spanish Inquisition, and the tradition of a sand floor dates back to when Jews were forced to convert to Christianity, but secretly practised Judaism in the basement of their homes.

Lindo said he read about Jamaicans asking ruling British officials in the 17th century to expel the Jewish community. Special taxes were imposed on Jews – considered second-class citizens because of their religion. Jews, at one time, were also forbidden to hold public office

Despite all of these restrictions, the Jewish community continued to grow and prosper for many years.

"There were some tough times, but the challenge is now to save what we have," said the 65-year-old Lindo, father of three boys and four grandchildren, who says he shares some wonderful stories with his family about the younger years in Jamaica.

Memories are so comforting that Hendricks, who came to Canada at age 10, said his family decided to have the bar mitzvah of one of their sons at the synagogue in 2005.

"It was something special – we will never forget it," said Hendricks. "When I step in to that synagogue, it's my home."

There is a small fence in front of the synagogue, but no cameras or uniformed security to protect the building, despite its being located a few blocks from one of the tough areas of the city.

"Jamaican Jews don't have to worry about antisemitism or racial problems," Lindo said. "Everyone gets along."

Adjacent to the synagogue, on the same property, is a small cemetery and a hall that serves as a multi-purpose room and houses a collection of artifacts tracing ancestry.

"It's a marvellous building that needs to be preserved along with the Jewish heritage or it could all very easily disappear," said Lindo, who developed an urge to raise some money once he returned from the Jamaican simchah involving his extended family.

"My parents were never wealthy when I lived there, but they always found ways to make sure I was in synagogue on Shabbat – first for classes and then services. I know how important it was to them and to me to preserve cultural programs, archives and maintain the synagogue and cemeteries.

"Growing up Jewish in Jamaica, I mention it all the time – the people, the community and the flashbacks of memories that remain so precious to me," said Lindo. "I just knew that I had to give something back, just help out."

Trial by peace

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

In the upcoming Torah passages, we read of the ritual of the sotah, the suspected adulteress. Anyone who has studied these passages immediately understands the controversial nature of the material.

It involves a husband who suspects his wife of adultery but doesn't have the required proof to bring her to justice. There's no way to resolve the issue, so he brings her before the high priest and the whole community. There she is publicly accused of being a suspected adulteress and is shamed and made to drink "bitter waters," which consists of water, earth from the Temple grounds and a curse written and dissolved into the water. If she survives the ordeal, she's innocent and will be rewarded with children. If she's guilty, her innards will shrivel and drop.

The sotah ceremony is one of the few trials by ordeal that Judaism records. Essentially, the concept of a trial by ordeal is that when disputes can't be resolved by the usual methods, they still need resolution. In such a case, God is invoked as Final Judge, assuming that God wouldn't allow an innocent person to be punished and exonerates the innocent while condemning the guilty. The sotah ceremony stopped in the early Rabbinic Period. Aside from logistical difficulties, the sages usually preferred that we handle things ourselves through a judicial process.

The usual controversy that surrounds the sotah ceremony today is that there isn't an equivalent ceremony for men. Certainly there are parallel suspicions that can be lobbied against a male suspected of being intimate with a married woman. Where is the trial by ordeal for the man?

I suspect we can ask that question because we're sitting in a modern world. It's not that no one would dare give a man a trial by ordeal. On the contrary: the fact is that men lived with it almost constantly. In the ancient world, warfare was seen as the ultimate trial by ordeal. If God favoured you, you would win, and if you had sinned, God would let you lose. Any war arena became the ultimate trial of your relationship with God based on your daily choices.

The ancient world didn't honour the men so as to exempt them from trial by ordeal, but rather created the male world entirely around these trials. It's in the face of this overwhelming worldview that the sages proclaimed the power of peace. It's not a test of your faith to engage in warfare, but rather a test of your commitment to God to solicit peace.

When the sages were discussing entering the Land of Israel, they stated that if the land gives us food and drink, we still have nothing unless we have peace. "If there is no peace, there is nothing at all." The text goes on to say: "Peace equals all else. Indeed we say, when God made peace, God created everything."

Inspiration from Israel and Hollywood

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

Archeology has fascinated me since I was a young boy living in Israel many years ago, not long after the founding of the state in 1948.

At that time, archeology was a national pastime in the young state. It was small wonder, since a number of prominent Israelis were involved in the discipline. Among them was Yigael Yadin, chief of operations for the Haganah during the War of Independence, and his more famous contemporary, Moshe Dayan, who would go on to become chief of staff of the Haganah and defence minister of the fledgling nation.

Both men had a passion for archeology, but Yadin's was scholarly in nature. In addition to his work on the Dead Sea Scrolls, Yadin went on to excavate a number of prominent sites that grabbed the popular imagination. The best known was Masada, which Yadin excavated in the early 1960s. Masada's heroic resistance during the first Jewish Revolt against Rome has raised it to iconic status, not only in Israel, but throughout the Jewish world.

However, Yadin also excavated other sites that were not as well known publicly, but just as important historically. Chief among these was the site of Hazor, in the upper Galilee, which Yadin excavated in the late 1950s. In addition to serving as a training ground for the next generation of Israel's leading archeologists, it also shed light on one of the most important problems in Israel's early history – the conquest of Canaan, (or the lack thereof, as some scholars now believe).

As all of us know, that conquest was preceded by the Exodus from Egypt and the theophany at Mount Sinai, two of the most pivotal events in our history as a people. For many of us of a certain age, these events were immortalized by Cecil B. DeMille in his epic film, The Ten Commandments.

Films such as DeMille's The Ten Commandments added to my fascination with our past and led me to spend my life studying it. DeMille was a master of the biblical epic and had also made Samson and Delilah in 1949. (Interestingly DeMille's mother was Jewish). This film dealt with the formative period of the Judges, which is one of most fascinating eras in Israel's early history from both an archeological and historical point of view.

When I was growing up in the 1950s Hollywood was producing a whole slew of "sword and sandal" epics, as they came to be called. These films, corny as they may have been, were a source of both fascination and inspiration for a generation. They were an introduction to our phenomenal history and helped to instil in some of us a sense of pride in our inspirational past.

After the horrors of the Holocaust, Hollywood and the new State of Israel showed the world that Jews were capable of heroic acts in both the past and the present.

Struggling with God

By Rabbi Michael Skobac

David Hazony's recent book The Ten Commandments reveals that while most people feel strongly about the commandments, few are actually able to enumerate them. Even for those who have pondered these foundational spiritual directives, the very first one is often perplexing.

Indeed, some thinkers have questioned whether the introductory statement that "I am the Lord your God who took you out of the land of Egypt from the house of slavery" (Exodus 20:2) should even be considered a commandment, but rather simply as a declaration of fact.

Nonetheless, belief in God as expressed in the famous credo, "Hear O Israel, the Lord is our God, the Lord is One!" (Deuteronomy 6:4) has always been the essential focus of Judaism.

Rabbi Moshe Chaim Luzzatto, and virtually every classical Jewish thinker, maintained that the ultimate goal of all the Torah's commandments is to connect us to God. Judaism seeks not just assent to the idea that God exists, but the development of an intimate personal attachment and relationship.

Of course, in a world where the winds of cynicism, secularism and materialism blow strongly, growing numbers of Jews find it difficult to fully embrace this ideal. Sadly, a recent Harris Poll revealed that 52 per cent of Jewish people surveyed claimed not to believe in God. Many would probably identify strongly with Woody Allen's quip, "If only God would give me a clear sign… like making a large deposit in my name in a Swiss bank!"

Many of our sages question how a commandment to believe in God even makes sense. If one already believes, there's no reason to be commanded. And if one doesn't believe, he or she can't simply turn on faith like opening a water faucet.

Rabbinic Reflections

Rabbi Shalom Noach Berezovsky's groundbreaking work Nesivos Shalom suggests that the essence of the commandment to have faith is really a challenge to yearn, seek and strive for faith – to struggle with faith. This applies to both the believer and the one who does not yet believe.

According to the Babylonian Talmud, the first thing we will be asked in the afterlife when we leave this world will be whether we conducted our business affairs faithfully. The holy Rebbe of Sanz had a fascinating spin on this question. He understood it to be probing whether we dealt with our faith in the same manner that people engage in business.

People who have some money don't just want it to sit around. In order to grow their money, they do lots of research and seek all kinds of investment advice. Do we invest as much time and energy to grow and nurture our faith?

The etymology of our national name, Israel, reflects the idea of struggling with God (see Genesis 32:29). In many ways, this is also an inner struggle. Rav Tzadok HaKohen of Lublin teaches that not only are we supposed to believe in God, we also must believe in ourselves. By getting in touch with our own innate spirituality, we can find a path to connecting with the Almighty, who created us in His image.

The Six Day War – the headlines

After six days, the war is ending. By mid-June 1967, Israel's lightning victory still dominates world headlines. But now questions are being asked about the war's aftermath – questions still not resolved as we mark the 45th anniversary of the Six Day war.

June 12: Revenge or peace: the choice

From The Guardian: Now comes the bargaining, and it will be hard bargaining. So hard that a settlement may never be reached. The Arab governments, with strong Soviet backing, will refuse Israel's minimum demands. The Israelis, after total victory in the war, will not water down their requirements. Thus a deadlock is likely… we should be foolish to count on such a quick settlement. [http://bit.ly/6day31]

Gail Asper to chair Winnipeg CJA campaign

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — One of Canada's best-known and most successful fundraisers is taking charge of this year's Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign.

Gail Asper was originally supposed to chair the annual campaign last year. She had expected to be able to give the federal government a $105-million cheque in April 2011 from the Friends of the Canadian Human Rights Museum, and the "rest would be up to the government," she said.

But it didn't quite turn out that way.

So while Asper now takes charge of the CJA campaign, she will also continue to fundraise for the $350-million museum, the last major project launched by her father, Israel, who died in October 2003.

"I have always been good at multi-tasking," she said.

Asper said that she has been feeling guilty over the years – while fundraising for the museum – about neglecting her home community. "Winnipeg has a wonderful Jewish community," she said. "My family and I have enjoyed the many benefits the community has to offer.

"I felt that chairing the CJA campaign would be a good way to reconnect with the community. Considering that the Asper Foundation is the largest donor and I am the foundation's president, as chair of the campaign, I can get to know better the personnel involved in the community's governance and fundraising as well as the beneficiary agencies."

Gail Asper

As campaign chair, Asper will be sitting on the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg board, as well as its budgets and allocations committee.

"We are excited that Gail accepted our invitation to chair the committee," said Elaine Goldstine, the federation's executive director. "When Gail takes on a job, she gives it 100 per cent."

Asper, in turn, has nothing but praise for the work of the federation. "I am very impressed by the level of transparency and scrutiny at every level," she says. "The CJA has a crack team and is an incredibly efficient operation. It is rare to find a fundraising operation where expenses are less 10 per cent of the funds raised."

The money raised from the campaign has been growing steadily for the pasts several years. Last year, the community contributed $5.4 million, Goldstine said.

"We are anticipating raising more this year, but haven't yet set a target," she said. "Super Sunday is scheduled for Sunday, Sept. 9, while the Women's Philanthropy kickoff will be Sept. 10."

One of Gail Asper's priorities as CJA chair, Asper said, will be growing the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg Leave More Than Memories Endowment Fund, which her father helped initiate in 1989. The fund, administered by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, currently has a capital base of $3 million.

"I am a huge believer in the importance of endowment funds," Asper said. "An endowment fund is a permanent source of funding that can serve as a buffer for regular donors who leave our community or pass away. The best time to build on an endowment fund is when the parent organization is financially stable. This is a perfect time in our community to work on increasing the size of our endowment fund."

Asper helped create an endowment fund for the Manitoba Theatre Centre. That fund now sits at $12 million – the original goal was $10 million – and last year produced $500,000 in interest for the use by Manitoba's leading theatre company.

The Women's Campaign chair for 2012-13 is Beth Goldberg, a veteran community fundraiser who co-chaired the Women's Campaign 10 years ago. She has been a campaign volunteer for 30 years and recently retired from teaching.

"Beth and Gail make a great team," Goldstine said.

GrowWinnipeg effort marks 10 years of success

WINNIPEG — On June 3, Winnipeg's Jewish community will be celebrating a remarkable transformation.

Ten years ago, faced with a community whose numbers had declined from a peak of about 21,000 people in 1961 to just over 14,000 by 2002, Jewish leaders were looking for ways to reverse the trend.

In response, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg established the GrowWinnipeg Initiative to stabilize and increase the city's Jewish population. But while it also focused on keeping young Jews in Winnipeg and persuading former Winnipeggers to return, the program has seen its greatest success in attracting new immigrants.

The effort has led to more than 1,600 Jewish families moving to this city from Israel, eastern Europe, the United States and South America, boosting Winnipeg's Jewish population to more than 16,500.

The celebration will be held at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, and organizers are hoping that up to 600 people – newcomers and host families alike – will attend. The evening will feature a kosher barbecue by leading Jewish chefs in the community, as well as a popular local DJ and door prizes.

"The idea grew out of a conversation that some of us had last summer about doing something to thank our new community for welcoming us as they have," said Sergio Levy, a member of the organizing committee who came to Winnipeg with his wife, Adriana, also a committee member, from Buenos Aires 10 years ago.

"We started working and meeting with other groups over the winter. We have had a lot of interest."

Organizers have promoted the event on Facebook and on the federation's website. There will also be a video with stories from the new Jewish Winnipeggers that will hopefully inspire others to move here.

"It was a shidduch made in heaven," said Evelyn Hecht, the federation official who was key in encouraging immigration and ensuring that newcomers were heartily welcomed.

"Our program was more successful than we dared imagine. The people who came were just the kind of people our community needed and wanted."

Initially largely from Argentina and more recently mainly from Russia and Israel, they were, for the most part, younger professional people with young families. As a result, the community's average age is lower than it was and the newcomers have eagerly embraced the community and its institutions.

Sergio and Adriana Levy, for example, were originally deciding between Toronto and Winnipeg. Sergio first came to Winnipeg as a result of a visit by Winnipeg community representatives, led by Hecht, to Buenos Aires. He said he was so impressed by the welcome he received here that he didn't bother with Toronto. Paulina Rozenman, also from Buenos Aires, chose Winnipeg over Toronto for the same reason. "There are opportunities for our children here that weren't available in Argentina," she said.

GrowWinnipeg co-ordinator Faye Rosenberg Cohen said the new arrivals from South America, Israel, Russia and elsewhere have changed the culture of the community.

"Newcomers and long-established members of the community have met in the middle," she said. "I have gotten more used to hugging and kissing [the South American way of greeting] rather than shaking hands. And the new members of our community help us appreciate better what we have here." —M.L.

USY holds spring convention

Compiled by CJN Staff

HAMILTON, Ont. — The Eastern Canada Region of United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY) held its four-day spring convention earlier this month at Beth Jacob Synagogue here.

The youth group, affiliated with United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, included chapter members from Toronto, Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Ottawa, Hamilton and London, who attended programs for Kadima members (grades 5 to 7) and USY members (grades 8 to 12).

Using the theme "Back to the Future," the students focused on learning, social action and fun and elected next year's regional executive board. They also raised close to $200 for tzedakah.

Participants explored what it means to be part of the Jewish People, held discussions about Jewish advice they wish they'd had when they were younger, and thought about questions they would ask their future selves if given the chance.

On Friday, the group enjoyed a Great and Amazing Scavenger Hunt around the Hamilton neighbourhood. On Saturday night, convention delegates were treated to a trip to Adventure Village, where they enjoyed miniature golf, batting cages, bumper cars, rock climbing and arcade games.

Convention co-chairs were Haley Szereszewski from Beit Rayim Synagogue in Thornhill, and Joshua Seed from Toronto.

Officers for the 2011-2012 ECRUSY regional executive board were elected. Noa Zaifman of Congregation Or Shalom, London, Ont., was elected president, succeeding Jonah Eisen of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation in Toronto.

Among the annual awards handed out were one for the most improved chapter, which went to Hamilton's Beth Jacob, and chapter of the year, which went to Or Shalom of London. The Sharon Cole Memorial Scholarship was awarded to Michaela Sadinsky of Agudath Israel Congregation in Ottawa for her service and commitment to ECRUSY.

Mulcair, Rae mingle with CJPAC partygoers

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — While thousands of students were demonstrating in the streets of Montreal, more than 800 other young people were mingling with politicians over drinks against the backdrop of pulsating music spun by a DJ.

The scene the night of May 17 was the dimly lit l'Arsenal, a chic, contemporary art gallery in Griffintown, a onetime factory originally built in 1843.

This was the fourth annual Action Party hosted by the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), an independent organization that seeks to get young Jews and others who are pro-Israel interested in politics.

CJPAC, founded seven years ago, is trying to get young adults actively involved in politics, not only reading the news and voting, but becoming a member of the party of their choice or working on election campaigns at any level.

"It's amazing to watch so many people who might otherwise avoid politics break through that barrier," said Kim Heilpern, an Action Party chair.

"Bringing the community and politicians together for a fabulous party with great food, music and drinks is a great way to show that becoming politically active can be both easy and fun."

This was by far the largest turnout yet, suggesting that the party has become a prized ticket despite the $60 ($70 at the door) price tag. Two busloads of attendees came in from Ottawa to join the Montrealers.

While the protest was not nearby, the student unrest did have a direct effect on the event. It coincided with the national assembly's sitting to draft emergency legislation to end the crisis, and no MNAs were present. Last year, Premier Jean Charest was a surprise guest.

Nevertheless, CJPAC recorded 30 federal and municipal politicians in the capacity crowd, which made its way around two life-size black horse mannequins with lampshades on their heads.

The partygoers had an opportunity to meet two national party leaders: the official Opposition Leader, New Democrat Thomas Mulcair, who attended with his wife, Catherine Pinhas, and interim Liberal Leader Bob Rae, who was joined by his wife, Arlene Perly Rae.

There were also two federal cabinet ministers, Diane Ablonczy, minister of state for foreign affairs (Americas and consular affairs), and Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, as well as Deepak Obhrai, parliamentary secretary to the minister of foreign affairs.

New Democrats were conspicuous by their large turnout. Several of the now year-old NDP MPs from Quebec joined in the informal get-together, including Tyrone Benskin and Isabelle Morin of the Montreal ridings, respectively, of Jeanne-Le Ber and Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine; Jonathan Genest-Jourdain of Manicouagan in the Charlevoix-Saguenay region; Françoise Boivin of Gatineau and Mathieu Ravignat of nearby Pontiac; Mylène Freeman of Argenteuil-Papineau-Mirabel; Pierre Nantel of Longueuil-Pierre Boucher; and Jamie Nicholls of Vaudreuil-Soulanges, as well as veteran Winnipeg Centre MP Pat Martin.

Official Opposition Leader Thomas Mulcair and wife Catherine Pinhas attend CJPAC's Action Party in Montreal.

The ranking municipal politician was Michael Applebaum, chair of the Montreal executive committee and mayor of the Côte-des-Neiges-Notre-Dame-de-Grâce borough. Côte St. Luc Mayor Anthony Housefather was joined by almost all of his councillors.

Supporters of Israel and the Jewish community must be present in the political process, CJPAC's Toronto-based executive director Mark Waldman emphasized.

"If our community is going to be heard and have an impact, it will be because average Jewish and pro-Israel Canadians participate in the democratic process. Young people are especially open to this message."

The format seems to work: no speeches or introductions. Politicians wear name tags, and attendees are on their own to meet them – or not.

CJPAC has an office in Montreal, led by regional director Steeve Azoulay, and other events are held here throughout the year. For more information, visit CJPAC.ca.

By-law changes for Baycrest:
By-law No. 6 - 2012 for each of the Baycrest corporations will be presented to Baycrest members for approval. Made in anticipation of the Not-For-Profit Corporations Act, 2010 coming into force later this year, By-law No. 6 reduces the corporate membership to one class: the elected directors. Currently, elected directors are the only members who may vote. The by-law ensures that this continues when the new legislation is in force.

By-law changes for The Baycrest Centre Foundation:
By-law No. 18 replaces the previous By-law No. 17 and includes the following changes. References to the Women's Auxiliary and the Vice-President of Finance are deleted. Inactive standing committees have been eliminated and the Finance and Audit committees have been merged. The Executive Committee membership has been revised accordingly. Minimum responsibilities are specified for Directors. The by-laws further provide that elected directors for 2012 will be elected for a one-year term in preparation for a governance review which may affect the board's structure.

Predictions abound in Egypt's election

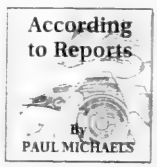
On the eve of the first round of Egypt's presidential elections slated for May 23, Canadian media reports reflected a range of views about the likely winner and the impact these elections could have on the future of Egypt and the wider Arab world.



Although the final result may not be known until a second run-off election (if necessary) is held in mid-June, the National Post's Peter Goodspeed noted that the stakes are high: "The result, which is far from predictable, will shape the future of the Arab world's most populous state and could determine whether last year's Arab Spring can produce a new era in Middle East politics."

While Goodspeed declined to predict an outcome, he noted that the dozen candidates in the running pitted "Islamists against secularists and revolutionaries against members of the former regime." He reminded readers that Egypt's parliamentary elections held last fall saw the Islamists of the Muslim Brotherhood (with almost 50 per cent) and the more extreme Salafists (with 25 per cent of the seats) dominate.

Might this not indicate that in a country as religiously conservative as Egypt, an Islamist candidate for president is most likely to prevail? Not necessarily, according to Goodspeed. "But concerns that the Muslim Brotherhood might dominate Egypt's politics, could see the group's official candidate, Mohamed Mursi, do poorly. Still, the party's grassroots organizing ability has the potential to get out the vote."

Writing a May 20 analysis piece for CBC's website, Mideast correspondent Sasa Petricic noted the uncertainty in the race, but focused on Amr Moussa. A 75-year-old former head of the Arab League, Moussa is considered by many, Petricic noted, to be the leading contender for the presidency.

"[H]ow did a secular, former Mubarak official like Moussa end up as a front-runner?" Petricic asked.

"[H]e's been playing on two big fears that Egyptians have of their future... [W]hile the vast majority of Egyptians consider themselves devout Muslims, it's not so clear how many actually want to live in a state defined by religion. Moussa has raised the spectre of an overbearing and risky 'Islamist experiment' if his rivals win. Just as important, he's been promising a return to stability and prosperity."

Petricic pointed out that with the economy "in tatters" and many without jobs, no candidate will likely be able to turn things around. As a result, there is a strong chance of fresh protests emerging in what optimists consider to be a budding democracy.

Filing for the Globe and Mail from the upper Egyptian district of Komboha on May 22, Patrick Martin had a different prediction: "The outcome of the vote here, and across the country, is likely going to be the election of an Islamist president – either Mr. Mursi or Dr. Aboul Fotouh."

Fotouh, formerly with the Brotherhood, broke ranks by running for the presidency before the party decided to enter the race. Often called a "moderate" Islamist in western media circles, he is oddly supported by both liberal reformers and the Salafists of the al-Nour party, whose own candidate was disqualified.

According to Martin, the prospect of an Islamist president, however, "scares the devil" out of the Christian Copts who live in Komboha in an often tenuous relationship with their far more numerous Muslim neighbours. (Copts make up about 10 per cent of the Egyptian population of 80 million, and the same proportion among Egypt's 50 million eligible voters.)

Given these figures, Martin concluded: "With three major candidates vying for the secular 30 per cent, and two major candidates fighting for the Islamist 70 per cent, the numbers seem clear: It could well be an all Islamist runoff election."

If so, who indeed will there be to protect minority rights? And if minority (and individual) rights cannot be protected, what does "democracy" really mean?

As this column goes to press, votes have yet to be cast, although preliminary results will be available at the time of publication. Readers will thus have the benefit of deciding who among the media experts perhaps best captured what's happening in this vital area of the Arab world.

Photo exhibit promotes SACH

Abigail Cukier
Special to The CJN

HAMIILTON — One out of every 100 babies throughout the world is born with a congenital heart defect, often a problem that can be repaired, but in many countries, there are no physicians to perform the surgery.

Save a Child's Heart (SACH), an Israeli-based, non-profit organization, provides urgent cardiac surgery for infants and children from underprivileged areas, at no cost.

Since 1995, SACH has performed more than 2,800 surgeries on children from 42 countries. It also trains medical personnel in developing countries to do proper followup with the children. The goal is to train physicians and thus establish centres of competence within these countries.

For example, Ethiopia, with a population of 83 million, has three pediatric cardiologists, two of whom were trained by SACH. Not one pediatric cardiac surgeon lives in Ethiopia, however, and SACH is now training a pediatric cardiac surgeon.

The cost for each child's operation is $10,000, which includes hospitalization, local transportation and room and board at the SACH home for recuperation.

When Dr. Lorne Finkelstein, chair of the Hamilton Jewish Federation's public relations committee, learned about SACH, he wanted to find a way the community could help. The committee decided to bring the SACH international photography exhibition, From Art to Heart, to Hamilton to foster awareness of the program and raise funds for SACH Canada.

The exhibition, which was on display for one night at Beth Jacob Synagogue May 16, provides a glimpse of the children, families, doctors and nurses as they go through these life-changing journeys.

Chef influenced by spices of native India

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Meet Linda Hertzman and you know right away you've met a strong, determined woman. The culinary whiz behind the Vancouver-based catering company Classic Impressions, Hertzman, 54, routinely wows Vancouver's Jewish community with exceptional food that goes far beyond ordinary Ashkenazi fare.

Her background in a country where spice plays such a prominent role may have something to do with that.

Hertzman grew up in Kochi (previously Cochin) in the south of India.

Part of a Jewish community of 200 at the time she lived there, she developed a fondness for the culinary world at a young age, but initially, the odds were stacked against her. For one thing, the family had a cook, so Hertzman had little opportunity to prepare meals herself. As well, her father had other plans for her.

"He wanted me to have a profession," she recalls.

So she went off to university, graduating with a master's degree in psychology by age 24. In between her university courses, though, she snuck off to Indian cooking schools to pursue her passion for savoury dishes.

While she was still a student, Hertzman met her future husband, Toronto-born Steve Hertzman, who was travelling in India on business. When she made aliyah in 1983, the two kept in touch, and a year later, they married.

The couple moved to Toronto where Hertzman looked for Canadian recognition of the degrees she'd worked so hard for. Instead, she was told they were not considered equivalent to those offered in Canada, and that she'd have to return to school if she wanted to become a psychologist.

The writing was on the wall, and Hertzman decided to ditch psychology and follow her first love – cooking. She enrolled at the George Brown College cooking school and at Seneca College, taking courses on food service and restaurant management, to learn the details of her chosen career.

Over the next 10 years, she helped out in the family business, a bulk food kosher store called Raisins, Almonds & More, on Bathurst Street south of Lawrence Avenue. Three children followed, and in 1994, the family relocated to Vancouver to purchase a restaurant called Leon's. They renamed it Aviv's Kosher Meats, and Hertzman headed the kosher kitchen, preparing meals for Jewish family services and doing some kosher catering on the side.

She found a culinary ally in Zari Layegh, an Iranian chef who had worked in Montreal's kosher restaurants and knew Jewish cooking. Together, the two put their own spin on kosher catering, with thematic offerings including Middle Eastern, Indian, Continental and Moroccan Sephardi dishes.

With extensive catering experience at companies including Motorola and Canadian Airlines, Hertzman is no stranger to cooking for large numbers. These days she lends her talents to food service for a local hospital group, preparing more than meals each day.

Her favourite kind of cooking, though, is for the private catering contracts she signs for weddings, bar mitzvahs and private functions.

"I put a lot of Indian fusion into my dishes, making items like kubegh, a dumpling with a meat filling, and pastels, similar to blintzes but more savoury," she says. "I love playing around with flavours, trying out different things and then having the satisfaction of seeing people enjoy my food."

At an event catered by Hertzman you might find yourself eating hameem, a traditional Cochini cholent, or meat kofta kabobs and fish dishes with a twist of Indian and Moroccan flavours.

Culinary themes are the latest trends, she notes, particularly themes with an Asian influence. "We'll still have salmon on the menu, but it's more likely to be miso salmon than lemon pepper."

Linda Hertzman

When you regularly prepare dinner for 100, cooking for a crowd of 10 begins to look easy. At home, Hertzman whips up amazing meals for her family and friends in no time at all, making the process look effortlessly easy. It helps that kosher ingredients are readily available through her spouse's business, the Kosher Food Warehouse in Vancouver.

But as any foodie will tell you, cooking is about so much more than mixing ingredients. It takes a pro to know just how much sauce will bring out the flavour, which spice will be most effective and how to revolutionize an ordinary dish. Hertzman has an innate knowledge of these things, and as a result, Classic Impressions has become a go-to catering company in Vancouver.

Young leader mourned

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — There was a prominent absentee at this year's Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's annual Kavod Award evening on May 23.

Sadly, Richard Tapper, the scheduled recipient of the Harry Silverberg Young Leader of Distinction Award, was unable to keep the date, as a life full of promise was cut short in a losing battle with colon cancer. Tapper was just 35.

He was diagnosed with Stage 4 colon cancer on New Year's Eve. Despite the grim diagnosis, Tapper tried to live his life as normally as possible almost to the end. Just two weeks before he died, he gave a lecture while fighting through the pain.

Kids recover quicker from war trauma: psychologist

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

An Israeli psychologist specializing in trauma says children react to the horrors of war and terrorism in much the same way as adults do, but they tend to recover more quickly.

"The younger you are, the more at risk you are [to trauma]," according to Naomi Baum, director of the resilience unit at Herzog Hospital's Israel Center for the Treatment of Psychotrauma (ICTP) in Jerusalem.

"Cognitively, adults and children are quite different, but in terms of the way they feel and react to trauma, the emotions are the same," Baum told The CJN in a telephone interview. "Fear is the same, anxiety is the same. We would like to think that we are shielding our children, but in general, they are exposed to trauma and react to it."

But children "are more malleable [than adults] and heal more quickly in general."

Baum will address, via Skype, the third annual conference of Doctors Against Racism and Anti-Semitism (DARA) slated for June 3 at Sunnybrook Hospital's McLaughlin Auditorium. This year's theme is "War Trauma and Children."

The event will also hear from retired Canadian general Romeo Dallaire, who commanded UN forces in Rwanda; Dr. Homer Tien, a trauma surgeon who served in Afghanistan, and Dr. Frank Sommers, a Toronto psychiatrist and child Holocaust survivor who also served in Afghanistan.

The ICTP was formed in 1989 to contend with an alarming phenomenon: an estimated nine per cent of Israelis suffer from post traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), three times the levels in other western countries.

But as Baum pointed out, the ratio of Israelis suffering from general trauma-related distress can spike at 80 per cent in times of war or terrorist attack.

In those instances, "a lot of people are anxious, aren't sleeping, have trouble concentrating," she said. "They may not fit the entire standard definitions of trauma, but if people are suffering, we treat them. We don't have to have a complete PTSD diagnosis."

Her approach is "not to look at what's wrong with someone, but at what's right with them, what works for them as a coping mechanism, and then we try to strengthen what they already have. In a way, it's looking at the cup half full and not half empty," she told the news agency Israel 21c in 2009.

In addition to screening children for PTSD, Baum's program in Israel also trains mental health professionals in how to treat those who are identified.

She works with local schools, educating the staff about trauma and emotional resilience.

It's often "very difficult" to measure PTSD distress in children, especially infants, Baum said. "A lot of the information we do get about very young children is from parental reports, and those are obviously coloured by how the parents are doing."

The ICTP has developed and implemented programs both in the north of Israel, where children were affected by the Second Lebanon War in 2006, and in the south, where rocket bombardments continue to traumatize many residents.

Naomi Baum

Trauma, said Baum, has a cumulative effect.

"People tolerate a certain amount of trauma, and they get knocked down once or twice or three times, and they pop right back up. But on the fourth time, and it might even be a real small knock, that just floors them."

Baum has paid seven visits to Biloxi, Miss., to adapt pyschotrauma programs developed in the wake of terrorism in Israel for the treatment of survivors of Hurricane Katrina. She said the process can work the other way, too: survivors of human-made violence can help those who have lived through natural disaster.

She said there's "some evidence" to show that war and terrorism provoke deeper traumas than natural disasters, "but it's not entirely conclusive."

PTSD doesn't differentiate between the sources of trauma, which has to be life-threatening or perceived as such.

"It could be a car accident or a terrorist attack. Trauma is trauma."

To date, the most effective treatment has been cognitive behavioural therapy, or CBT, which uses both cognitive and behavioural therapies to help people cope.

"Some of it has to with processing the traumatic event itself, and some of it has to do with learning how to self-regulate, how to calm oneself down, how to breathe and relax," Baum said. "And some of it has to do with how to re-integrate [sufferers] back into regular life."

Asked whether a child can be beyond help, Baum said, flatly, "no."

Stretching helps keep you young

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

Most people are unaware of how important stretching is to maintaining basic body function.

Stretching is the key to maintaining balance, flexibility, muscle control and even strength. It can also be an effective method of fighting the effects of aging, and aid in recovering from or preventing injury.

Body parts are not created equal. Each muscle is designed for specific tasks. This means there are different ways to stretch each muscle.

Stretching provides different benefits depending on which part of the body you're stretching. Your arms and chest are responsible for general things such as lifting or pushing, as well as delicate, dextrous tasks such as bringing a fork to your mouth or opening a coffee creamer. Stretching your arms regularly provides appropriate muscle flexibility, control, and tone to achieve all of these tasks.

The core is designed to stabilize the body and maintain posture. Strengthening the core muscles can also help relieve chronic back pain. The muscles located within the core keep you upright and straight. Stretching these muscles will stabilize your posture and provide more effective control of your balance while increasing mobility in your torso.

Your lower body (hips, thighs, calves and feet) are designed to give you power. These muscles are naturally much larger than those in the arms and chest, in order to create large movements. They also support the entire upper body and torso. The muscles in your legs supply your body with the power it needs to initiate motion, as well as to sit and stand. Stretching your lower body relaxes these muscles, allowing for better control, which they need to do their job well.

There are two types of stretches: static and dynamic.

Static stretching is a stretch done during a rest period, holding a position until gradually achieving full extension. Dynamic stretching is an active form of stretching that essentially propels the muscle into its fully extended form. Both have their benefits. Ask a physiotherapist or personal trainer if you're unsure of which kind is right for you.

Still a lot of misinformation about the Holocaust

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

"Did you all know that the last Holocaust survivor died this year?" a young woman asked the group of students she was leading through the U.S. Holocaust Memorial in Washington, D.C., when I was there one day. The woman, I later learned, was the students' Grade 8 teacher at an elementary school in North Carolina.

Startled by her naivety and inaccuracy, I informed her that scores of Holocaust survivors worldwide are in fact still alive and well. Following her initial look of incredulity, she expressed her gratitude for my correction and carried on guiding her students.

If a well-intentioned North Carolina schoolteacher was reciting such flawed information to her impressionable students, one can easily conclude that there must be a profusion of others who are just as misinformed.

This year highlights the 67th anniversary of the end of the Holocaust, which was arguably the most odious of genocides.

Most Holocaust survivors are living their final years, and many have passed away. Because of this, an immediate challenge has arisen, since their testimonies of resilience, suffering and survival are at risk of passing on with them.

Earlier this month, I volunteered at a Holocaust symposium for high school students, organized by the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Such an event works as a constructive mechanism to actively engage students – especially those who are not Jewish – about the Holocaust.

As a granddaughter of three Holocaust survivors, I have had a deeply ingrained passion for Holocaust education since I can remember.

That passion has gradually increased through my Jewish schooling and involvement in the Jewish community as a teenager.

That said, it seems rather unlikely to me that someone who lacks a personal connection to this genocide could be as passionate about Holocaust education as most Jewish people are.

To my pleasant surprise, at the Holocaust symposium, I found the participants to be very respectful and interested in the subject matter and speakers, one of whom was Kay Andrews, the national outreach co-ordinator of the Institute of Education's Holocaust Education Centre at the University of London.

It is vital that events such as the Holocaust symposium be organized to empower both Jewish and non-Jewish adolescents and young adults to preserve the legacy of the Holocaust. Learning about the genocide can only help youth to be historically and socially aware, and spark their interest in both global and local affairs.

Another method by which our community can instil the importance and education of the Holocaust into others is by providing aid and services to Jews and non-Jews alike. By constantly employing our Jewish commandment of tikkun olam (repairing the world), we can gradually help make non-Jewish communities more sensitive to the history of the Holocaust and its aftermath.

Numerous Jewish aid agencies are devoted to helping the community at large, not just the Jewish community, in offering services such as housing, children's aid and elderly care.

Nonetheless, due to the fact that Ontario's diversity is steadily growing in the wake of difficult economic times, social service practitioners are encountering challenges. Even amid Jewish social service agencies' struggles to administer proper care to all citizens in the community, it is comforting to know that they are working tirelessly to pinpoint optimal methods of aid distribution.

Insomuch as the Jewish community continues to maintain tikkun olam as a high priority and work to assist and have regard for others, I believe that over time, other communities will begin to mirror our efforts.

The North Carolina schoolteacher should act as a catalyst in the effort to continue the pursuit of educating others about the Holocaust. Educational tools such as the annual Holocaust symposium are powerful and beneficial. However, the very existence of scores of Jewish aid agencies and their all-embracing mandates should also encourage non-Jews to view the Holocaust not simply as a Jewish tragedy, but as a profound calamity for all of humankind.

Anti-African violence in Tel Aviv condemned

ITA

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. Jewish groups called on Israel to protect African migrants in Israel after riots in Tel Aviv.

"We hope and expect that the authorities will take effective measures to protect this population from further violence and that legitimate requests by refugees to remain in Israel based on fear of persecution in their home countries will be considered humanely and with due process taking into account internationally accepted norms," Rabbi Steve Gutow, president of the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the community's public policy umbrella, said in a statement May 24.

Violent riots in south Tel Aviv's Hatikvah neighbourhood on the night of May 23 ended with 17 arrests. The violence followed a rally against the presence of the migrants.

Africans who passed by the rally were attacked. Rioters smashed the windshield of a car carrying three migrants as well as other car windows. The rioters also set trash bins on fire and threw firecrackers at police, Ynet reported.

The rioters also broke into and looted shops associated with the African migrant community.

The Anti-Defamation League said it was "seriously concerned about the growing tensions in Israel over the issue of African migrants, and reports of lawlessness and violence committed by and directed against the migrants."

"While we recognize the complexity involved in properly addressing this issue, and sympathize with Israeli citizens whose personal security has been compromised by the lawlessness and violence of some migrants, we are disturbed by inflammatory public statements made by certain Israeli officials, some of which has veered into racism," the ADL said.

"It is imperative that reasonable solutions be found to confront these challenges, one that humanly treats the migrants while ensuring the security concerns of Israeli citizens are properly addressed."

The Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism condemned the violence.

"Such violence has no place in any civilized society, much less Israel, the nation state of the Jewish people who have throughout history known similar horrors rooted in ethnic and religious differences," the centre's director, Rabbi David Saperstein, said in a statement. "It is shameful that yesterday's rally instead devolved into chaos and brutality. It is also shameful that members of the Knesset made inflammatory statements that likely contributed to an atmosphere conducive to such violence."

The Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) said it was "saddened" by the violence.

"Jewish federations are saddened and concerned over growing tensions and violence directed at foreign workers in Israel," said Kathy Manning, chair of the JFNA board of trustees.

"While voicing concerns over the appropriate enforcement of immigration policy and rising violence may be legitimate, we deplore expressions of racism, the stereotyping of population groups and, of course, all violence."

All four groups welcomed Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's condemnation of the violence. The prime minister also said that the surge of illegal African migrants into Israel "threatens national security and identity."

Haredi community unites against Internet use

Ben Sales
JTA

NEW YORK — To the outside observer, the haredi Orthodox anti-Internet rally at New York's Citi Field may have looked uniform: a single mass of black hats, white shirts and brown beards.

But the crowd of some 40,000 men at the May 20 event was far from homogeneous.

Yiddish speakers sat next to Anglophones. Chassidim from Brooklyn mixed with "yeshivish" haredim (non-chassidic) from Lakewood, N.J. Bobov Chassidim cheered along with Satmars. These groups, while similar in many ways, usually stay within their own communities.

But it's hardly the first time the haredi community has faced a threat from the outside world.

As speaker after speaker at the rally made clear, the Internet is the latest in a series of threats dating back to the Jewish Enlightenment, or Haskalah, which first opened up a path for Jews to leave tradition for the secular world.

"Just as they fought tooth and nail against the Haskalah, they're fighting again against this," said Samuel Heilman, a professor of sociology at the City University of New York who studies haredi communities. "They live in a singular world. They've tried to keep all the doorways locked from the inside, but you can only lock something from the inside if the people are willing to keep it locked."

Rabbi Ephraim Wachsman, a prominent haredi lecturer, and other speakers made clear at the rally that they view the Internet as a profound challenge to the haredi way of life.

"This issue is the test of the generation that threatens all of us," Rabbi Wachsman said. "Your strength at this gathering will determine what we look like a few years from now."

At the same time, the Internet has become a necessity for many, if not most, haredim. They use it to conduct business, communicate with each other and even to promote Jewish observance.

"In the sense that they have already used the Internet to spread their message far beyond the local community, the Internet has been good for them as well," Heilman said. "They're going to use it, going to say that the end justifies the means."

The late Lubavitcher rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson, famously embraced technology as a means of spreading the faith. The Chabad-Lubavitch movement, which did not officially participate in the rally, was an early adapter to the Internet age and has used online tools to spread its message.

"Everything God created in this world could be used for good or the opposite," said Rabbi Zalman Shmotkin, director of Chabad.org. "It's our responsibility to channel the enormous powers of technology in a positive manner."

But the Internet's dangers – not just pornography and the window it provides into the secular world, but even its potential for distraction – present the haredi lifestyle with the challenge of how to use it for good while keeping out the bad.

The haredi community is not alone in this struggle.

Jason Miller, a Conservative rabbi who maintains an active Web presence, said the Internet challenges anyone who cares about ethics.

"To some extent, we all need to have the Internet moderated for us," Rabbi Miller said. "Beyond modesty, there's content that I don't think is healthy or beneficial for individuals to see or read."

Adrianne Jeffries, a female blogger who snuck into the rally disguised as a man, wrote that although she's not haredi, she found herself agreeing with some of the speakers' points at the rally.

"There wasn't much I could quibble with in the speech," wrote Jeffries, who blogs for BetaBeat, a technology blog associated with the New York Observer weekly newspaper. "The Internet is about instant gratification? It's 'fleeting and empty?' It causes us to waste productive hours? It threatens the preservation of isolated communities with strong traditions, such as the ultra-Orthodox Jews? Well, yes, but…"

For a community whose survival depends in part on maintaining its isolation, the Internet can be particularly pernicious.

"Jews should separate themselves from the general community," Rabbi Yechiel Meir Katz, the Dzibo rebbe, said at the rally. "The great rabbis have done so in order to safeguard future generations."

Even as he delivered his speech – in Yiddish that ran with English subtitles on Citi Field's JumboTron – many in the crowd could be seen thumbing their BlackBerrys or iPhones.

"The battle against the Haskalah they lost," Heilman said. "It's clear that they've lost this one already."

Alan Mittleman, a professor of Jewish thought at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary, said that on the contrary, the haredim are winning the battle against the Internet just as they survived the Haskalah.

"It's a problem that they've already solved," he said of the Internet. "It's more powerful and invasive, a new kind of threat, but it's the same kind of thing."

Israel Briefs

Leaders briefed on Iran

The top U.S. negotiator in international talks with Iran arrived in Israel May 25 to brief Israeli leaders. Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Wendy Sherman was there to "reaffirm our unshakeable commitment to Israel's security," the department stated, Associated Press reported. The visit came after Iran and six world powers, including the United States, met in Baghdad last week to discuss halting Iran's nuclear program. Israel has consistently criticized Iran for stalling in the talks, which Jerusalem believes is buying time for Iran's clandestine nuclear weapons program. The next round of talks will be held in Moscow, June 17-19.

Talmud translated

A Talmud that took famed scholar Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz 45 years to translate from ancient Hebrew and Aramaic into modern Hebrew is being published in English. The first volume of Rabbi Steinsaltz's Koren Talmud Bavli was launched in conjunction with Shavuot, which marks the day the Torah was given to the Jewish People. The complete set will comprise 41 volumes. The Koren Talmud Bavli includes a translation and commentary by Rabbi Steinsaltz, as well as pictures and colour photos. An iPad app will be out in July, Koren Publishers Jerusalem said.

Women detained

Three women were detained after trying to pray at the Western Wall in tallits. The women, part of a group of about 40 from the Women of the Wall group, were praying on May 22 as part of their monthly Rosh Chodesh service, the Jerusalem Post reported. A policewoman approached one of them and asked her not to wear a tallit the way a man would and then adjusted it for her. Police took contact details for three of the women in tallits, who were told they would be called for questioning. Under a 2001 law, women may not wear tfillin or tallits, or read from a Torah scroll, at the Wall.

Turkey expands Holocaust education

Launches campaign for full membership in ITF

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

ANKARA, Turkey — Turkey has launched a quiet but concerted campaign to qualify for full membership in the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research.

The ITF, as it's known, was founded in 1998 at the initiative of Sweden. It currently has 31 members, including Canada, Germany, Israel, Poland, Britain, France and the United States.

Three countries, Turkey, Portugal and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, have been granted observer status in the ITF, whose honorary chair is Israeli Holocaust historian Yehuda Bauer.

Turkey, the sole Muslim state in this intergovernmental body, has been an observer since 2008, when its bilateral relations with Israel were at a peak.

"We're preparing to upgrade our status," said Ertan Tezgor, a seasoned Turkish diplomat who represents Turkey in the ITF. He made his comment in a recent interview at the Turkish foreign ministry.

At the moment, Turkey is seeking to raise its status to "liaison country," one level below full membership, said Tezgor, Turkey's former ambassador to Georgia. "We have not yet decided when we will apply for full membership."

In its quest to attain this objective, Turkey – a secular republic and NATO member that remained neutral almost until the end of World War II – is taking concrete steps to fulfil ITF core principles.

Ertan Tezgor

In Holocaust education, Turkey has created a working group to enlarge references to the Holocaust in Turkish history textbooks.

This effort is being spearheaded by the ministry of education in collaboration with the ministry of foreign affairs, said Tezgor, who, while acknowledging Ankara's solidarity with the Muslim world, takes pride in Turkey's "excellent relations with the Jewish people" and in its venerable Jewish community.

Turkey, in partnership with Anne Frank House in Amsterdam, also plans to host teachers' seminars on the Holocaust in Istanbul.

And next year, the first group of Turkish teachers is scheduled to go to Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies.

A delegation of Turkish teachers was due to arrive in Yad Vashem in the spring of 2010, but abruptly cancelled the trip in the wake of the Mavi Marmara incident, during which Israeli commandos stormed a Turkish ship in a flotilla of vessels trying to break Israel's naval blockade of the Gaza Strip.

In the field of remembrance, the Turkish government marked the 65th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz by sending Tezgor to the former Nazi concentration camp in Poland in January 2010.

Two months ago, several Turkish universities staged an exhibition on Anne Frank, the young Jewish diarist who perished during the last days of the Holocaust.

Earlier this year, Turkish state TV broadcast Claude Lanzmann's Shoah, an epic documentary watched by about five million local viewers, Tezgor said.

Since 2011, Turkey's missions abroad have sponsored the screening of Turkish Passport, a documentary that amplifies Turkey's role in assisting Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe.

The film, shown to Jewish and Turkish audiences in Canada last year, has been broadcast on Turkish television and screened in movie theatres in Turkey.

With respect to research, Turkey is in the process of assembling a team of Turkish scholars to study Turkey's response to the Holocaust. According to Tezgor, Turkish archives from this period will be opened to researchers within five years.

And in the future, universities in Turkey will offer courses on the Holocaust.

"It's important to open up history," said Tezgor, who keeps lines of communication open with Yad Vashem, Anne Frank House and Project Aladdin, a cultural initiative launched in 2009 under the patronage of UNESCO to counter Holocaust denial, fight all forms of racism and intolerance and promote dialogue among Muslims and Jews in particular.

Tezgor, who described the Holocaust as a "very tragic matter," added, "We want to open all the files so that everyone can see things clearly. A country's past should not be hidden."

Suggesting that Turkey can play a special role in the ITF, Tezgor said, "We'll be a bridge between the Muslim and non-Muslim worlds and thereby add value to the ITF."

Turkish membership in the organization may well encourage more Muslim states, such as Morocco, Jordan and Azerbaijan, to join the ITF, he noted.

Claiming that Turkey had no ulterior motives in joining the ITF, Tezgor said its membership has no bearing on its desire to join the European Union.

Turkey's bid for full membership is ardently backed by Turkish Jews, said Sami Herman, the president of the Jewish community. "We have to support Holocaust education so as to prevent tragedies from occurring in the future," he said in an interview in Istanbul.

Indictments prepared against four Israelis over flotilla incident

JTA

ISTANBUL — A special prosecutor in Istanbul has prepared indictments against the four top Israeli commanders who led the 2010 raid on the Gaza-bound Mavi Marmara ship.

The 144-page indictment seeks 10 aggravated life jail sentences for each commander, including former Israeli Defence Forces chief of staff Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, according to the English-language Turkish news service Today's Zaman, citing the Sabah daily.

The other Israeli commanders to be indicted reportedly are navy commander Vice-Adm. Eliezer Marom, military intelligence chief Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin and the head of Air Force intelligence, Brig.-Gen. Avishai Levi.

The indictment mentions 10 "slain Turks." Nine Turkish nationals, including a Turkish-American man, were killed in clashes during the raid. The 10th person is a man who remains in a vegetative state, according to Zaman. The indictment also reportedly refers to 490 victims and complainants, including 189 who were reported injured in the attacks.

Gabi Ashkenazi

Sabah said the indictment was submitted to Istanbul Chief Public Prosecutor Turan Colakkadi, who is expected to approve the request to submit it to the appropriate court.

On May 31, 2010, Israeli Navy commandos boarded the Mavi Marmara, which claimed to be carrying humanitarian aid, after warning the ship not to sail into waters near the Gaza Strip in circumvention of Israel's naval blockade of the coastal strip.

Israel's government-appointed Turkel Commission found in its investigation that the government and the military behaved appropriately, and that the blockade of Gaza was legal.

The United Nations' Palmer Committee also found the blockade to be legal, but said Israel used excessive force while boarding the vessel.

Turkey's inquiry deemed the Gaza blockade and the Israeli raid to have been illegal. Ankara has called on Israel for an official apology and compensation for the raid, and to lift the Gaza blockade. The two countries have broken off diplomatic relations and military agreements since the incident.

Bulgarian Jews face tough times

Dianna Cahn
JTA

SOFIA, Bulgaria — The stories – some months or years in the making – started trickling in last year. Young successful families were showing up desperate.

As Bulgaria's program director for the American Joint Distribution Committee, Julia Dandalova ran social services programs for the Jewish community's most needy: elderly pensioners and children of poorer families.

Now she was getting calls from people her own age, thirtysomethings with well-paying jobs, nice homes and cars – people she'd never imagined were struggling.

They told her they'd fallen behind on their mortgage payments and the bank was threatening to take back their homes and their leased cars. People who had everything were facing the abyss of poverty.

New website helps find the right lawyer

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Two Jewish Canadian college buddies hope their new Internet site will make it easier for people to come up with an answer to the question, "Do you know a lawyer who does…?"

Shane Coblin, 36, a Vancouver-based commercial litigation lawyer, and Lawrence Tepperman, a Toronto-based entrepreneur who specializes in startup companies, are pushing forward with a new computer technology called Legal Linkup, a site that matches people with the right lawyers who fit their budget.

Shane Coblin

Coblin said he came up with the concept for Legal Linkup in 2010 after he spent years listening to his friends and clients complain about how difficult and time consuming it can be to find the right lawyer.

"I have clients and friends who have small businesses, who are always calling me up saying, 'I need someone to do a will, I need someone to do patents and IT stuff for my company, some cross-border immigration stuff' – stuff that I don't do and my firm doesn't do. And I didn't know where to find them," Coblin said.

"One of the complaints my friends had was: 'What? I'm going to go to Google and call 15 people, interview them, sit down with them – it's such a waste of time. Their time is just as valuable as my time.'"

Coblin added that they also expressed concerns about whether they could trust a new lawyer to do a good job and whether the lawyer they did find would fit in with their budget.

"The year before that, I'd seen these kinds of freelance marketplace sites like Guru.com… It seemed like really good lead generation software for people who don't know where to look."

"Lead generation" describes the process of generating consumer interest in a product or service.

Enter Tepperman, whom Coblin had maintained a friendship with since his University of Western Ontario days when the two were fraternity brothers in Sigma Alpha Mu, a Jewish fraternity.

"He's a business guy and he kind of fills in the parts that I can't do. I'm the technical guy that knows the law and technology and I know a good idea and concept and how to design it… Over the years, we've always talked about doing something together and this seemed like the perfect thing," Coblin said.

He explained that Legal Linkup gives the power to the clients.

Clients post their legal issues – anonymously and for free – onto the site, and the member lawyers are able to view the postings. If a lawyer is interested, he or she will send the poster a quote.

For a fee, the lawyers – all of whom must have a bar membership number and be in good standing with the law society – create profiles that advertise their areas of expertise. There is also an option of upgrading a subscription to be featured on the homepage of the site.

"This streamlines the approach completely. They can go to one spot, confidentially post what they're looking for. It will get sent to the lawyers that practise what they need and then those lawyers can review the listing, ask some questions and can send a proposal with their rate… The client would have four or five proposals they can choose from," Coblin said.

He said that once clients settle on a lawyer, their information is sent only to that lawyer and they are free to negotiate and make other arrangements off the site.

"It's almost like online dating sites. We try to match you with a lawyer that is going to fit your needs."

He said what makes the concept of this site so appealing is its efficiency.

"When you get a client calling you, if he or she is not relevant to you, it ends up taking you 15, 20, 30 minutes for you to figure out that they are not right for you and you've wasted all that time," Coblin said.

As a Legal Linkup subscriber, a lawyer will receive an e-mail each morning detailing the listings that were posted that are relevant to their practice.

"That will take you five minutes. You get rid of the inefficient use of time."

Although Coblin said he has ambitions for Legal Linkup to grow into an international site, he said that so far the focus has been on attracting users in the Greater Toronto Area.

"We started pushing it in January in Toronto – just to make sure it works and fills the needs we want it to. We just wanted to see how well it would be received in one area and it's been received really well."

He said they get up to five new listings a day, and have about 50 lawyer subscriptions, but anticipates that once the word spreads, the interest will grow.

"This is the next step in lead generation for lawyers. This is where people will go to find a lawyer now." For more information, visit www.legallinkup.com.

Project features 3-D digital pregnancy guide

Hanna Szekeres
NoCamels

John Wilmot, the second Earl of Rochester, said in the 17th century, "Before I got married I had six theories about bringing up children. Now I have six children and no theories."

Millions of new parents every year still have the same questions. But when does parenting start? Some couples say it's at the moment of conception. That's when they start asking questions, such as what constitutes a healthy diet during pregnancy and what's the best position for the woman to sleep in, and they wonder about different approaches to child rearing.

A new in-depth research-based project soon to be launched aims to help couples go through pregnancy. It's the first cross-media project for pregnancy and birth with 3-D animation.

The project, a high-quality digital video guide that is accessible on the Internet and as a mobile application, provides information that changes as the baby grows.

The project includes three products: 40weeks, a digital guide consisting of four-minute chapters for each week of pregnancy, a film called 9months and a DVD for children named Where Do Babies Come From. All three products include 3-D animation that allows viewers to follow the development of the baby.

Niv Adi, founder of 40weeks, told NoCamels that the project gives solutions to two major needs: "First, every pregnant woman, and couple, is curious about the development of the child, and there is only so much an ultrasound can do. The 3-D animation shows you exactly how the fetus matures. Second, the project includes a mobile application where mothers can contact a doctor for assistance."

The 40weeks video series follows three local couples who share their experience of pregnancy. Every chapter includes the embryo, the mother, medical exams and special tips. The series' 3-D features represent progress in terms of combining cinema and science. The series' creators restored all the motions made by the fetus in all the stages of the pregnancy.

"It has been possible for years to watch the movements made by the fetus by means of an ultrasound and different films. But taking a glimpse into the womb was occasional and mainly brief. However, the 35-minutes-long animation demonstrates the reactions and the movements more precisely," the 40weeks team said.

Fred Herzog photographed Vancouver's Jewish streets

In a recent Globe and Mail feature, arts columnist Marsha Lederman presented a lengthy consideration of the German-born Vancouver photographer Fred Herzog, which included a detailed self-portrait, largely related to Lederman's parents' experience as Holocaust survivors and her own inheritance connected with that experience. Shortly after the piece appeared, Herzog was due to be considered for the prestigious ScotiaBank Photography Award (which he did not win).

As Lederman points out, Herzog's career has undergone a steep rise in influence and success over the past decade, partly based on the increasing sense that his Kodachrome shots of Vancouver in the late 1950s and after are a basis for the important photographic tradition that has flourished in British Columbia.

The bulk of Herzog's work remained little seen into the 21st century until a well-received show at Vancouver's Presentation House Gallery in 2003 and a major retrospective at the Vancouver Art Gallery in 2007 turned the tide. More recently, the National Gallery in Ottawa presented a smaller showing of his work.

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

If you have not seen Herzog's oeuvre in galleries, a lavish and lovely recent collection, Fred Herzog: Photographs (Douglas & McIntyre) is the latest among a series of book projects aimed at presenting Herzog's photographic art to the average reader.

The occasion of Lederman's interview with Herzog at his Vancouver home led to what could only be called an eruption – Herzog's unsettling response to Lederman's queries regarding a boyhood under the shadow of Nazism and war, his seemingly failed efforts to read carefully in Holocaust-related history, and, ultimately, Herzog's apology for having stumbled into an area of consideration that he admitted he was ill-prepared to discuss with care or insight.

All of this, one might argue, provided a full-stop distraction from what is important about Herzog's images, what has drawn galleries and collectors to them, and what it is that they contain that relates to Vancouver's urban Jewish history. The latter issue, entirely uncommented upon, is enough to make a reader on Jewish Canadian daily life pick up Fred Herzog. But the pleasures associated with the book are many. The volume is outsized, allowing the publisher to present a substantial number of photographs from the 1950s and '60s in the largest format available in print (if you are an art collector, Herzog's Vancouver Equinox Gallery sells his images, printed in various sizes, from $1,800 and up).

Vancouver in the late 1950s and '60s, especially the side of town that drew Herzog's eye, is in many ways gone. The culture of colourful signs; the relative quietness of street traffic; the busy shopping culture on thoroughfares like Hastings and Main; the low-rise, small-scale business buildings of the east side of the old downtown have all largely been erased or gentrified following the city's post-Expo 1986 successes.

Not every viewer of Herzog's oeuvre will experience nostalgia at the sunset glow on Powell in "Crossing Powell," or muse with interest over the dead emptiness at the corner of Main and Alexander, with its backdrop billboard painted on a red-brick apartment block, reading: "ARMY and NAVY Dept. Stores Ltd. WE DO SELL FOR LESS." Army and Navy was the kingpin of east side Jewish businesses, run to lasting success by Samuel Cohen, who rose out of the pawn-shop culture of his compatriots and became a major landholder and retailer in the city – the Jewish counterpart to the anglo-elite Spencers and Woodwards, who sold many of the same things in buildings not so far from the big Army and Navy outlet on Cordova and Hastings.

The titles of Herzog's photographs say nothing about the downtown's specific ethnic history, and it may be that Herzog took no notice of it (though I doubt this). All you had to do was step into the smaller "Buy – Sell – Trade" outlets surrounding the Army and Navy to meet the middle-class, hardworking, often Polish- or Russian-born Jewish family man or woman, or son thereof, behind the till.

Although there is a fabulous array of subjects in Fred Herzog: Photographs – the front windows of Chinese cafés, the heartbreaking array of nighttime neon on Granville, the billboard culture of an earlier era, the disarray of pre-Granville Market False Creek (in one case on fire) – Herzog's work is the best source if you want to see what the Jewish pawn and loan businesses of the postwar era looked like. There is little left of the Jewish downtown storefront culture of Canada's western cities. Unless one has access to someone with the visual memory of a journalist and a penchant to tell stories about postwar street culture, this era is gone with the wind.

The introductory essays in Fred Herzog: Photographs make no mention of this aspect of the work they mean to present. They are by luminaries such as the novelist and pop culture pundit Douglas Coupland and the major Vancouver photographic artist Jeff Wall, among others. These writers have their eyes on other aspects of Herzog's work. In his informative essay, Jeff Wall begins this way: "Until about 1970 there was something called old Vancouver, that city still characterized by the wooden houses in which most of its inhabitants dwelt... Vancouver in 1950, 1960 or 1970 had a real beauty." That beauty, well captured in Herzog's photographs, included the hardscrabble businesses of European-born Jews on the streets of the city's east side.

Norman Ravvin writes of Jewish western Canadian life and history in his volume of essays Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue. He is at work on a novel set partly on Vancouver's once mean streets.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

World famous cellist visits Toronto

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Music is in Alisa Weilerstein's blood. The 30-year-old American cellist is the daughter of professional violinist Donald Weilerstein and pianist Vivian Hornik Weilerstein. Even her brother Joshua is a well-known violinist and conductor. In short, it is no surprise that she became the cellist extraordinaire that she is today – but she is quick to note that her parents never forced the instrument on her.

"They were the opposite of stage parents, they weren't pushy," Weilerstein told The CJN during her recent visit to Toronto, where she performed Brahms and Shostakovich as a part of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra's Matinee Masterworks and Casual Concerts series at Roy Thomson Hall.

It was actually Weilerstein's grandmother who first introduced her to the possibility of playing the cello. Weilerstein was only 2-1/2 years old at the time. Her parents were away on tour and her grandmother was babysitting, trying to put a smile on the face of the young toddler who had just caught the chicken pox.

Her grandmother, whom Weilerstein described as a sort of Joan of all trades, fashioned an entire string quartet out of cereal boxes. The cello, Weilerstein remembers, was made from a Rice Krispies box, and she immediately fell in love with it.

"I would scrub away at this thing trying to make a sound," she said with a laugh, adding that when her parents practised music at home, she would sit alongside them with her cereal box cello.

Finally, at age four, Weilerstein's parents got her a child-sized cello and she began lessons. When she was 13, she debuted as a soloist at the Cleveland Orchestra, after moving with her family to Cleveland, Ohio, from Rochester, N.Y.

"I really got excited," Weilerstein said when asked about her debut performance at 13. She added that she didn't get stage fright even as a young teen.

Following her performance, Weilerstein went on to attend the Cleveland Institute of Music's preparatory program, where she went to regular high school classes in the mornings and studied music intensively in the afternoons. When she was 16, she got the cello that she still uses to this day – a rare 1790 Willian Forster cello. "You have to have a bond with the instrument, but it also grows with you," she said, explaining that playing over the years actually changes and develops the sound of an instrument.

In 2011, Weilerstein received the prestigious MacArthur Fellowship for her work. This great honour was another of her many important awards, including the Avery Fisher Career Grant and the Leonard Bernstein Prize at the Schleswig-Holstein Music Festival in Germany.

Despite her incredible talent and blossoming career as a musician, Weilerstein continued to pursue her education. In 2004, she graduated with a degree in Russian history from Columbia University in New York City.

Weilerstein's busy performance schedule, often including about 140 performances each year, has taken her to stages around the world, but when she finds time, she tries to perform with her parents as the Weilerstein Trio.

"There's a family bond, but there's also a musical bond," she said, explaining that there is no sugar-coating the truth in rehearsals with her parents, but the honesty and closeness create a heightened level of musical understanding among the three musicians.

Weilerstein's most recent major project has been recording Edward Elgar's Cello Concerto with famed pianist and conductor Daniel Barenboim. The recording will be released in November on the record label Decca Classics, to which Weilerstein has recently been signed.

Cellist Alisa Weilerstein

Between her performances and her recording schedule, Weilerstein struggles to find time to get to her New York City home for some rest and relaxation, but she hardly seems to mind. "I feel very lucky – there's never a dull moment."

Patinkin pays tribute to Yiddish music

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Mandy Patinkin is bringing his critically acclaimed ode to Yiddish music, Mamaloshen, to Toronto for two shows in June.

The shows, presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, are the revised dates for the shows that were postponed last September due to labour strife.

Mamaloshen (Mother Tongue) is Patinkin's tribute to the rich and diverse Jewish musical traditions from Belz to Broadway and Yiddish theatre to Tin Pan Alley. In 1997, he recorded the Mamaloshen CD and then took it to the live stage in 1998, first Off-Broadway and then to Broadway later that year.

"The way it started was Joe Papp, producer of A Chorus Line and many other things, who is a father figure to me and a dear, dear friend, asked if I would participate in a benefit for YIVO Institute for Jewish Research in New York," says Patinkin, an actor and singer who has won Tony and Emmy awards and whose credits are vast, including Evita on Broadway, the television series Chicago Hope and the movie The Princess Bride.

Trouble was Patinkin didn't know any Yiddish songs, and Papp told him it was time he learned one. "So, Joe sent me over a song called Yosel, Yosel, ironically in English, this song means Joseph, Joseph. It was a wonderful, classic Yiddish song that I later recorded on one of my CDs."

Mandy Patinkin

With the help of friends, children of Holocaust survivors, Patinkin learned the Yiddish repertoire, including songs from eastern Europe, from the Holocaust era, Tin Pan Alley and the Yiddish theatre, but he felt something was missing.

"Yiddish songs, as I learned through this material, was a history of these gypsy people – stories about births, deaths, weddings, celebrations, difficulties, traumas and great joy," he says. "I realized the piece that was missing was the American Jewish composers who had assimilated, like Irving Berlin, Yip Harburg, Rodgers and Hammerstein, Stephen Sondheim and Leonard Bernstein, but had that Yiddish feeling, that storytelling nature."

Patinkin took the songs God Bless America and White Christmas, by Berlin; Sondheim's Maria and Paul Simon's American Tune, and translated them into Yiddish

"I always found when in performing, if I explain a song ahead of time, it ruins it... it's not for me. So, how do I make people understand a language that very few people speak anymore? I wanted it to be universal. At the end of the day, it is a story about an immigrant, who happens to be an American Jewish immigrant. People from many other cultures would see the show and come back and talk to me about how much it spoke to them. I was deeply moved by that," he says.

"Whatever your background, even if you have never heard the language in your life... take a walk in that world. Let the words wash over you... you don't need to understand it, it will affect you, I guarantee you"

Surprisingly, save for hearing one tune from his father, Patinkin didn't grow up listening to Yiddish music. It held no memories for him. So when he opened himself up to this art form, he heard echoes in way he doesn't understand, nor does he feel a need to understand.

"I am celebrating the cultural heritage. Yiddish is a folk language made up of ancient German, Russian, Polish, Hebrew and God knows what else – all a patchwork quilt because these people were on the move," he says. "This show is very dear to me. I am grateful that I get to do it several times a year. When I'm not performing it, I sing it to the trees!"

Patinkin was recently in Israel filming the second season of the Showtime hit Homeland. A supporter of the Israeli left Patinkin advocates an end to the settlement building in Israel and was one of the artists who signed a petition in 2009 calling for a boycott of a Jewish theatre in the West Bank.

Patinkin performs at the Bluma Appel Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts, on June 16 at 8 p.m. and June 17 at 2 p.m. For tickets, call 416-366-7723 or online at www.stlc.com. For more information, visit www.hgjewishtheatre.com.

Daniel takes on the Rosenberg spy case

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Sidney Lumet's 1983 film Daniel, adapted from E.L. Doctorow's novel The Book of Daniel, is a sobering and moving film.

Scheduled to be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on June 3 at the Al Green Theatre at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m., it's the thinly disguised story of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, who were charged with treason and executed in 1953.

Weaving back and forth between the present and the Cold War era of the past, Daniel explores a sensational espionage case that became a cause célèbre in left-wing circles.

Having been accused of violating the 1917 Espionage Act and stealing atomic secrets for the Soviet Union, America's arch enemy, the Rosenbergs paid dearly for their alleged crimes.

In Daniel, the protagonists are Paul Isaacson (Mandy Patinkin) and his wife, Rochelle (Lindsay Crouse), who were both Communists. They join demonstrations on behalf of the downtrodden, champion working-class causes and work for the rights of African-Americans.

On the question of his characters' guilt, Lumet is noncommittal, but he subtly suggests they may have been wrongfully convicted at a time when paranoia in American society ran rampant and "red-baiting" was virtually a national sport.

Daniel, in the main, focuses on the couple's arrest and the impact their execution had on their two vulnerable children, Daniel and Susan (played excellently by Timothy Hutton and Amanda Plummer).

Shunted from one home to the next after their parents' incarceration, they were finally adopted by kind and considerate foster parents.

The film opens as Daniel and Susan, now adults, engage in a heated discussion at their foster parents' dinner table. Susan, a radical who believes her parents were framed and murdered, wants to establish a foundation in their honour. Daniel, a postgraduate student, concurs that a miscarriage of justice occurred, but he prefers to keep a low profile and is none too enamoured of his sister's idea.

At this point, Daniel flashes back to the late 1930s, when communism was a cause embraced by a tiny minority of American Jews, including the Rosenbergs. Like the Rosenbergs, the Isaacsons are passionately committed to the Republican side in Spain's civil war, the working class and full equality for African Americans. With World War II raging, they sing the praises of the "gallant Soviet allies."

Lumet does not examine their personal connections with the Soviet Union, limiting himself to their general political beliefs and conviction as spies.

Mostly, he concentrates on exposing the effect their activities had on their children, not only when they were youngsters but when they are fully grown adults.

The cast is superb. Apart from Hutton and Plummer, first-rate performances are turned in by Patinkin and Crouse, Edward Asner (who portrays the lawyer defending the Rosenbergs) and the child actors who depict Daniel and Susan.

One of Lumet's finest films, Daniel remains timely and relevant.

Reading father's diary inspires writer

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – It's such a common refrain – "When I retire, I'm going to write a book." Many plan to do so, but few actually complete the task.

But former university professor Marvin Blauer has recently published an imposing, 556 page tome, turning his "retirement" into more of a second career.

Blauer's career has taken some very interesting twists and turns. The native Montrealer, educated at McGill University in commerce and arts, then completed his PhD in political science and began his teaching career at Brock University in St. Catharines.

During what was to be a one-year assignment in Winnipeg, both tragedy and opportunity resulted in Blauer's deciding not to return to St. Catharines. His first wife died, leaving two young children, and then-premier Ed Schreyer offered Blauer a job in his cabinet.

He accepted the job, eventually met and married Cathy and the family remained in Winnipeg until the government changed.

The cover of Marvin Blauer's book

Next stop was Regina where Blauer was once again recruited to a government position. Over the ensuing years, he served provincial and federal governments at the cabinet level and later formed his own consulting company to provide governments and NGOs with his expertise in such areas as social development programming, education, immigration and Aboriginal affairs.

As the much-younger sibling of three, Blauer was very close to his parents and always fascinated with knowing their history. He was forever asking them questions and more questions, wanting to hear their stories. Finding his father's diary opened up a whole new world to him and enabled him to see his parents in a totally different light.

They were not just "parents," but people with a fascinating background which Blauer longed to explore.

"I had always told stories about my parents and their history to my children; my children urged me to write the stories down," said Blauer. "It took me seven years. I decided to write the story as if it were a novel because I wanted to make the people come alive."

Blauer's book, Struggle: A Quest for Life, Love and a New World, contains a bit of everything: true-life romance and adventure, 20th century East European history and the fall of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the Jewish immigrant experience in North America, and a Yiddish-English glossary. There are maps and photographs to help the reader visually immerse oneself in the story.

The story begins with the teenagers Munya and Eva meeting, falling in love and then being separated by the vagaries of war. Interspersed with their enduring love story, Blauer weaves the history, geography, and social development of the times.

More than simply a retirement project, the book is beyond a family keepsake. It offers both entertainment and education and is, above all, a good read.

EYE ON ARTS

By BILL GLADSTONE

LOST IN YONKERS REPLACES ACTOR TOUCHED BY SUDDEN TRAGEDY

We were in the audience on Thursday evening, May 17, for the opening of the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's impressive production of Neil Simon's Pulitzer Prize-winning play, Lost in Yonkers.

The play focuses on two brothers who are left in the care of their severe and intimidating grandmother in Yonkers, New York, in 1942 after their mother has died and their father, a travelling salesman, takes to the road. Adding plenty of colour are sweet but childishly excitable Aunt Bella, who lives with the grandmother, and Uncle Louie, a tough-talking gangster who comes to visit.

As written by Simons, the piece is a funny, nostalgia-tinged gem, and the HGJTC cast – consisting of Marion Ross (Grandmother), Linda Kash (Bella), Ari Cohen (Louie), David Eisner (father), Sheila McCarthy (Gert) and Jesse Shimko and Alessandro Costantini (the brothers) – brought out the sparkle in its many facets. Kudos to director Jim Warren for ensuring that even the set and the music were of an equal high quality.

Tragically, the day after the opening, Kash's husband, Paul O'Sullivan, was killed in a highway accident. Our deepest condolences to her and her family. But the show goes on. Forced to withdraw from the play, Kash was replaced by Finnerty Steeves, who played Bella off-Broadway in the recently acclaimed revival.

According to the New York Post, Lost in Yonkers is "the best play Simon ever wrote," and Simon, by most accounts, stands as one of the best Jewish playwrights of the latter half of the last century. Any talk that the play is unsuitable for a Jewish theatre company, as a Toronto Star critic suggested, is nonsense.

At the Jane Mallett Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre, 27 Front St. E., until June 10. $24.50 to $79.50. 416-366-7723, www.stlc.com

Dragon Boat paddler helps bring sport to Israel

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — It took a little prodding, but breast cancer survivor and dragon boat competitor Nancy Bennett made a decision that led to what she calls "an incredible experience."

Bennett took part in the first-ever Israel Dragon Boat Festival, held recently on Lake Kinneret, also known as the Sea of Galilee. Her boat finished first in the breast cancer survivor division.

"We were the top survivor team in the first-ever Dragon Boat Israel Festival! You can imagine our joy!" Bennett said with passion shortly after her return.

Bennett has been a member of the breast cancer survivor paddling team Avalon Dragons, in St. John's, Nfld., since it was founded six years ago to give survivors a way get fit and make friends. She was diagnosed with the illness 20 years ago when living in the United States. Four years later, she and her late husband, Arnold, moved to Newfoundland.

The couple were planning Nancy's trip to Israel when Arnold died suddenly last October. Despondent, Nancy thought she'd pass on her first visit to Israel.

"I eventually looked into it a bit more, went to a training camp for the Canadian team, and Frances Halpern of Toronto, one of the organizers of Dragon Boat Israel, placed me on the [Montreal-based] Canadian team, Two Abreast (Côte à Côte)."

Bennett was joined by two other members of Avalon Dragons, Marie Hyslop and Shirley Thorne, plus two women from Texas, one of whom was living in Italy. The rest of the team came from Montreal. Only two were Jewish.

Thirty-nine teams, totalling more than 900 paddlers, took part in the festival. Nine of the teams consisted of breast cancer survivors. Twenty of the teams were Israeli and 19 came from abroad – from Canada, the United States, Holland, Italy, Australia and Taiwan.

Dragon boat Two Abreast, which included Nancy Bennett, finished first in the breast cancer survivor division at the recent Israel Dragon Boat Festival.

Tailgators, a Canadian team, were overall winners, followed by Ohalo College (Israel), L'Chaim on the Mayim (Canada), Degania Bet (Israel) and Kinneret College (Israel).

Many of the overseas participants were visiting Israel for the first time. They spent 10 days on guided tours before competing in the festival.

The event was a joint Canada-Israel initiative, spearheaded by Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA and the Jewish community of Ottawa. Debbie Halton-Weiss, chair of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, conceived of the idea of holding a dragon boat festival on the Kinneret. In addition to introducing the sport to Israel and bringing people to the country, it raised more than NIS 200,000 (over $53,000 Cdn) for educational charities and youth programs.

Bennett picks up the story.

"Our first race was at 7:30 a.m. Lake Kinneret on the Sea of Galilee was calm and extreme heat was not yet evident. We were refreshed and strong, but pushed really hard to win the race [against a mixed field of men and women teams].

"It was nearly 40 degrees when we started our second race, paddling against eight other experienced breast cancer teams. We doused ourselves with water from the sea to cool off a little before the race started. We got a very good start, maintained a strong and steady pace and finished first in the race, taking first place overall in the breast cancer division."

During the closing ceremonies, they were treated like celebrities when they received their medals.

Bennett's impression of Israel was similar to those of many first-time visitors – "incredibly beautiful country. I'm not sure what I was expecting, but it was breathtaking, as though every square inch of land yields a story," said the 67-year-old public relations consultant. She is also the president of the Havura Congregation in St. John's.

In Israel, she said, there's an esthetic and beauty that's missing in North America.

She praised Vancouver doctor Don MacKenzie, who first recognized that paddling would help women overcome breast cancer surgery and become fit again. Prior to his initiative, women were told to lift nothing heavy and to avoid exertion.

"After he researched it, he found positive results, and now dragon boating is the fastest growing water sport in the world," Bennett said.

"I'm so glad I went [to Israel]," she said. "It showed me how important Israel is for non-Jews, too.

"The women on our team were so enthusiastic about the country, [and] now have a better understanding of antisemitism and the history of the Holocaust. They realize the need for a Jewish country. The depth of the feeling of non-Jews was quite beautiful to experience."

Road hockey tournament to raise funds for kids

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Prosserman JCC and Chai Lifeline will host the first-ever "Game On" road hockey tournament June 17 to raise money for children dealing with pediatric disabilities and illness.

The event will take place at the Prosserman JCC at 4588 Bathurst St. From 300 to 400 people are expected to play, with another 1,000 spectators, supporters and volunteers in attendance.

The tournament will feature divisions for young people and adults spread over 20 teams or more, as well as a celebrity all-star game. The day will also feature entertainment and family activities.

"As a mother of a special needs child, I am so proud to support Game On and the important causes it represents. I urge everyone to come out on June 17," said tournament co-chair Michelle Goldstein Zaldin.

Funds raised will go to support these youngsters' participation in summer camps and sports programs. So far, organizers have raised close to $25,000 in sponsorships, and they hope to raise another $50,000 from participants.

Individual adult players can register at a cost of $180. Team registration is $1,000 and individual youth registration is $100. Teams are asked to collect pledges as well, with the top fundraisers eligible for prizes, including a chance to play in the celebrity all-star game.

Teams will play at least three games. Each team must have a minimum of five players and a maximum of eight. Four players per team will be on the road at once, including one goalie. Players must bring their own equipment.

A number of celebrities have participated in a video promoting the event, including ESPN's Dan Shulman, former NHL coaching great Mike Keenan, Cabral "Cabbie" Richards from TSN and Environment Minister Peter Kent.

For more information or to register, visit the Game On website at http://chai.akaraisin.com/GameOn, or contact Alex Voihanski at 416-665-1836 or via e-mail at cageneral@chailifeline.org.

Comic faces some difficult career choices

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Amanda Day, 29, an up-and-coming standup comic on the Toronto comedy scene, is pretty confident you'll dig her style if you're open to a "smart, silly, and very, very dirty" kind of show.

Day, who called her style "loose but conversational," said she writes new material every week for her Thursday night gigs at Hotbox Café in Toronto's Kensington Market.

She said performing each week keeps her current because she's constantly writing new jokes.

"It's good because it makes you say yes to a lot of ideas. Normally, I'd be like, 'No, that's stupid,' and I'd talk myself out of it. If you had to come up with new material every week, you better just try it."

Day has been doing standup for the past five years, but supplements her income with a day job at a printing company.

"The thing that is so encouraging about standup is that when you look at your idols, like Patton Oswald, or Louis CK, you see what a long game it is, and they're like, 'Oh I've been doing this for 16, 20 years,'" Day said.

"There's this new comic named Kyle Kinane... and he was recently talking about having a day job forever, and being so afraid to give up that day job and health benefits... I want to take that leap, but I just want to make sure I won't be destitute a month later."

Although Day has been succeeding in lining up regular gigs – she hosts a monthly show called Comedy Machine at the Crown and Tiger bar every third Saturday night of the month in addition to her weekly spot at Hotbox – she knows she's going to have to make that leap if she ever wants a chance at becoming a household name.

"I have a real barrier right now. At some point within the next couple years, I'm really going to have to chose between becoming completely freelance with the comedy and acting and just go from there, or just stick with the day job and do this at night. It's a hard choice to make," she said.

But trying her hand in the comedy scene was a choice Day had made years ago, when she was still a teenager.

"I was always a performative kid growing up. I was always drawn to artistic things, whether it was acting, or drawing."

She said she completed a bachelor's degree at York University in visual arts before she enrolled at Humber College in its comedy writing and performance program.

"When I started doing standup and stopped being scared of doing standup, I was really taken by it," she said.

"I would say it becomes an addictive thing that you have to get up on stage. Luckily, there are a lot of places to do that around here."

She said while the Humber program helped her make connections with other aspiring comedians, few students ever make the sacrifices necessary to make a name for themselves.

"I have a nice little chunk of people from my year who are still doing standup and sketch comedy, but we're talking about 60 people who were in my course, and maybe 10 people who are still doing it."

Day spoke of her mother, a lawyer, who she called "semi-supportive" of her decision to pursue a career in comedy.

"It's kind of a weird dynamic where she wants to be supportive and accepting as much as possible, but then she'll say, 'If you should become a lawyer or doctor...' you know, like a typical Jewish mom," she said.

Day added that she also gets a lot of support from other members of the comedian community, as well as her audiences.

"There are a lot of all-female shows in the city, so when I'm playing for a female audience I definitely feel more support, but I think I play very well in front of men, just because of how dirty I can get. Everyone likes a good dick joke," she said with a laugh.

"It's not hard being an attractive lady up on stage talking about stuff like that."

Amanda Day

Although most of her on-stage experiences have been positive – "I'm pretty lucky that I've never been heckled," she said – Day recalls one gig that wouldn't necessarily make her highlight reel.

"One of my friends used to run an open mic night, and one day he was all excited because the manager of the bar told him they had booked a party and said he'd have a really good audience," she said.

"It turns out that the party the manager had booked was for a deaf group, and the weird thing about it was that they wanted music – I don't know if they wanted to feel the bass or whatever – so there was this deaf dance party going on while we were trying to do this show," she said, laughing.

But as a standup comic, Day's learned to roll with the punches, because it's the successes that keep her motivated to press on.

One of the highlights of her career came last year, when she opened for Maria Bamford, the first female comic to have two half-hour Comedy Central Presents specials.

She's also made her rounds on the late-night circuit, having appeared on The Tonight Show with Jay Leno, Late Night with Conan O'Brien and Jimmy Kimmel Live.

"She is very much a comedy idol of mine," Day said.

My criteria for picking friends

I'm not the friendliest person you'd ever meet. I mean, I have a couple of nice friends. I invite them over – Meir cooks for them; the kids smile at them: Sara, the dog, bites them, and we all talk about Nina Shenhav. I have very strict criteria for picking my friends. It's not location, location, location! It's admiration, admiration, admiration!

But, alas, one dark evening Meir comes up with a hideous idea. "Let's invite over some of my friends," he says bravely. His friends? You mean a group of strangers who wouldn't know I'm an actor in Israel, who wouldn't know I had a successful play, that I wrote books, that I was a prom queen?

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

"What would we talk about?" I ask pointedly.

"We'll find something," he says unconvincingly.

As we sit at the table, I gaze at the two couples. The blond woman, I instantly hate. She has this bizarre self-esteem! She talks about herself. Constantly.

The brunette, I hate even more. She's so thin and has this shiny hair! The guys are fine. I always get along with men.

Blondie: So, as a lawyer, I had this client and he was…

Me (bursting in): I once played a lawyer in a show. Everyone said I was the hottest lawyer on screen!

Blondie's husband: Wow!

Blondie: So, as I was saying, this client of mine wanted to find out if his wife was cheating on him, and…

Me (shouting): Yeah, in my second book, I wrote about this woman whose husband was cheating on her, and she killed him!

The silence is overwhelming. And then, the brunette says, "That's very interesting," and turns to Blondie again. "So, what happened with your client?" Blondie takes a deep breath, "Oh, it turned out he was cheating with his… work, after all."

Me: How unexciting!

Blondie: Excuse me?

Meir: She meant… how unexpected.

Brunette: A man who's married to his work (she looks at her husband)? Tell me about it.

Me: In my successful TV show, one of my characters was a workaholic, and once when I was prom queen, my boyfriend thought I was cheating on him, so he…

Meir (interrupts me): Nina! Enough, dear.

Me: I'm just saying, that when you are a well-known artist, a celeb, if you will, you have to understand, people are very intrigued by you. That's all.

Brunette's husband (looks warmly at me): Right!

Brunette: What's that got to do with anything?

Blondie (kindly, to the brunette): You're an accountant, aren't you?

I exit the dining room, rattled. Meir comes after me to the kitchen. We look at each other. He hugs me. "You're the most beautiful, talented, smart, interesting woman I've ever met," he says quietly.

"You're the only one who says so," I tell him, "and maybe a couple of my friends, and the kids."

"When will it be enough for you?" he asks, still holding me, looking into my eyes.

"When I start loving myself already!" pops out of my mouth unexpectedly, before I can think of a reply.

Hebrew web columnist Yossi Tastassa writes about Egypt's revolution, which he says may change the strategic balance in the Middle East.

While a labour dispute at one Centre de la petite enfance (CPE) in the Jewish community has been resolved, tensions over stalled contract talks at another are increasing. CPEs are the government-subsidized $7-a-day day care centres throughout the province.

Tell others about the residential schools

Shavuot is the holiday that commemorates the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai.

The Torah tells the story of the Jews coming out of Egypt. On Pesach, we're told to feel as if we were one of those Jews. So what does that mean? I think it refers to empathy. In other words, be empathetic and sense, feel and intellectually consider what it was like to be ruled by others.

How does one do that? Look out your window and see the native community. Walk over to them and ask them about the residential schools and listen closely. Watch their brows furrow and their eyes drop as they tell you about the brutal beatings and the children who went missing and were never heard from again.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

You'll feel empathy. You'll feel rachmanut – tremendous sympathy.

I take you through this exercise because I'm aghast that so many sophisticated Canadians, individuals who consider themselves aware and compassionate, know nothing about the suffering of our Aboriginal Peoples in residential schools. I'm even more upset that many Jews have never heard of this blight on Canada's human rights record, this black mark on our national soul.

I would ask you to share this article and the following points with your children, siblings, parents, friends, colleagues, cousins, bowling partners, teachers, principals and nannies. Tell every Canadian about the residential schools.

Let them know they were erected in the 19th century to Christianize native children so the government would no longer be required to pay for its treaty obligations. Tell them that more than 150 residential schools existed and thousands of children died there, while thousands more were subjected to physical, sexual and emotional abuse.

Tell your loved ones that church leaders and security forces would often take native children from their parents' arms and transport them hundreds miles away for an "education." Frequently, students wouldn't see their family for an entire year. The children – Métis, status and non-status Indian, Inuit, Inuvialuit and non-Aboriginal – were forced to change their names and were forbidden from speaking their languages.

On Shavuot, when we remember the giving of the Torah, we should recall as well the thousands of native children who were mentally abused, and murdered (some say as many as 100,000) in our country, Canada.

Ask yourself, "How could I not know this? Never again?"

Tell those you know that on May 10, 2006, an "Indian Residential School Settlement Agreement" was signed by the government of Canada, effectively giving reparations to any former student still alive as of May 30, 2005. This was the largest class action settlement in Canadian history. A lump sum of $10,000 was paid per student for their first year in school, and $3,000 was paid for each additional year. Further claims could be made for serious physical and sexual abuse.

How could I not know this? Why do we expect others to know about the Holocaust?

When you share the information in this column, include that Prime Minister Stephen Harper apologized to our Native brothers and sisters. Say that a "truth and reconciliation" process set up in British Columbia called for every school in Canada to teach about residential schools. Fortunately, the Northwest Territories will start a pilot project this spring in its public schools to teach about residential schools, and it plans to expand the project to 40 schools next fall. Shouldn't private Jewish day schools include residential schools in their curricula?

Familiarize yourself with residential schools. Teach others. We said we would.

Chag Samayach. Happy Shavuot.

Israel funds Conservative, Reform rabbis

JTA

The Israeli government has decided to pay the salaries of non-Orthodox rabbis and recognize them as community leaders.

The attorney general's office advised the Supreme Court last week that Reform and Conservative rabbis in some parts of Israel will be recognized as "rabbis of non-Orthodox communities" and will receive wages equal to those of their Orthodox counterparts.

Only rabbis in farming communities and regional councils – not in cities – will be eligible for the funding. The vast majority of Israeli Reform and Conservative communities are in large population centres.

The attorney general's office has said that for now, up to 15 non-Orthodox rabbis may receive state support. Before this decision, only Orthodox rabbis received state funding.

Some 4,000 Orthodox rabbis serve as rabbis of their communities and draw a salary from the government. Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein said the rabbis to be recognized would be known as a "rabbi of a non-Orthodox community."

The non-Orthodox rabbis will receive their salary from the Culture and Sports Ministry, rather than the Religious Services Ministry, which funds Orthodox rabbis. In addition, funding will go only to the rabbis of communities that request it, according to the Jerusalem Post.

Rabbi Miri Gold

Non-Orthodox rabbis, unlike their Orthodox colleagues, will have no authority over Jewish law or ceremonies such as marriage or divorce.

Last week's announcement followed out-of-court negotiations over a 2005 petition by the Israel Movement for Reform and Progressive Judaism and Rabbi Miri Gold, a Reform rabbi from Kibbutz Gezer in central Israel. Rabbi Gold had asked the government to fund the Gezer Reform community just as it funds Orthodox communities and their leaders.

A panel of judges presided over out-of-court negotiations, led by Supreme Court Justice Elyakim Rubinstein. Earlier this month, the panel asked the attorney general to intervene.

Play Disrupted

LONDON — Pro-Palestinian activists protested against an Israeli theatre company's production of The Merchant of Venice at the Globe Theatre in London. The May 28 protests of the Habima company's production began outside the theatre, where dozens stood waving Palestinian flags and urging a boycott of Israeli products. Pro-Israeli activists mounted their own rally. Inside the theatre, protesters began waving Palestinian flags and flashing signs against Israel during the play. They were removed, and the show continued. The Habima production is part of the Globe to Globe festival, a six-week event at the theatre featuring Shakespeare's 37 plays performed in 37 languages. A Palestinian company is slated to perform Richard II in Arabic. In a letter published March 29 in the Guardian, 36 British directors, writers and actors expressed "dismay and regret" about Habima's production.

Film Fest Cancels Film Screening

Dieudonné M'Bala M'Bala

CANNES — The Cannes Film Festival's screening of The Anti-Semite, a film by a French comic with a history of antisemitism, was cancelled.

The film by and starring Dieudonné M'Bala M'Bala was produced by the Iranian Documentary and Experimental Film Center.

It reportedly pokes fun at the Nazi concentration camp Auschwitz, where an estimated 1.5 million Jews were killed during the Holocaust, and features Dieudonné as a violent and alcoholic character dressed as a Nazi officer for a fancy dress party. Robert Faurisson, a convicted Holocaust denier, makes a cameo appearance. The film reportedly will be sold over the Internet.

"Antisemitism has no place at Cannes, and we welcome the clear statement to that effect from the organizers of the film festival," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League.

Dieudonné has been found guilty of inciting hatred in France.

Quebec's largest concert promoter pulled the plug on four shows scheduled for last month by Dieudonné, whose routine has included Holocaust denial and joking praise for Hitler. Belgian authorities last month forced Dieudonné to cancel two performances in Brussels. The French news agency AFP reported that police stopped him mid-performance May 9 after determining his act contravened local laws.

Genetic Link Found

TEL AVIV — Israeli geneticists have linked a Native American population in Colorado to Jews expelled from Spain during the Inquisition. Geneticists at the Sheba Medical Center in Tel Aviv discovered the genetic mutation marker BRCA1 in a group of Mexican Indians who had emigrated from Mexico to the United States over the past 200 years and settled in Colorado, Ha'aretz reported. BRCA1 is found in Jews of Ashkenazi origin and leads to a higher incidence of breast and ovarian cancer. Researchers say the mutation found in the Colorado Indians is identical to that in Ashkenazim, and dates to more than 600 years ago. Jews were expelled from Spain in the 15th century. Researchers say this offers genetic proof some of the Jews expelled from Spain who reached South America intermarried with the indigenous population, whose descendants later migrated to Mexico and then the United States. The Indians in Colorado don't have any traditions linking them to Jews, the researchers said.

Immigration bill's impact cause for concern

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

If the government's proposed new immigration law passes, it might turn away legitimate asylum-seekers fleeing persecution, including Jews, immigration experts and community activists say.

Bill C-31 – titled Protecting Canada's Immigration System Act – is being considered in the House of Commons, and its sponsor, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Jason Kenney, has said he wants the bill passed by June 29, before Parliament adjourns for the summer.

Jason Kenney

Detractors such as the Canadian Civil Liberties Union and the Canadian Association of Refugee Lawyers, among others, say that provisions in C-31, including the proposed creation of a list of designated "safe" countries of origin, give too much power to ministers and don't give refugees enough time to establish their cases before Canada's Immigration Refugee Board (IRB).

Janis Roth, executive director of Jewish Immigration Aid Services (JIAS) Toronto, said she has concerns with the proposed safe country designation and changes in the right to appeal process.

"We all know that a country that is deemed safe for some may not be safe for others. This bill also proposes to treat refugee claimants differently depending on how they arrive – by boat or plane or as a single or in group – and whether by way of a 'safe' country, and as such, we are concerned about the implications for the safety and protection of bona fide refugees," Roth told The CJN.

"There are also proposed longer waiting periods for permanent resident status and limits on travel documents for refugees that may prolong their settlement and separation from their family."

She said that although JIAS' annual caseload of refugees is relatively small, it's important that the Jewish community "act on behalf of all current and all potential immigrant clients and to ensure a service delivery system that is equitable, just, compassionate and ready to respond and assist immigrants at any time."

Immigration experts also fear that, based on comments made by Kenney, Hungary could be designated a safe country when two communities are being targeted there by the state: Jews and Roma.

In April, Kenney said he believes many claimants, specifically Roma (also known as Gypsies), from Hungary were making false refugee claims and abusing Canada's refugee system.

An April 22 report in the National Post cited IRB statistics showing a spike in Roma claims from 2010 to 2012. The story quoted Kenney as saying that Canada has been trying to educate the Roma about how to properly apply to immigrate here.

"We tried to circulate brochures explaining 'This is not the way you immigrate to Canada,' and it's had no impact," Kenney told The Post.

In March, Hungarian-Jewish author Akos Kertesz, 80, fled to Canada and sought asylum.

Community building in Jerusalem

From the editor's desk...

It's not a particularly religious proposition to state that God's work on Earth falls to human beings to perform. For who, if not we, can make the world better? When we pray, or implore, or beseech, or hope, or lift our eyes in supplication, we are often, in effect, also reminding ourselves of the task at hand, of the need to find the strength if not also the courage to fulfil our responsibilities to one another.

Thus, for example, when in our prayers we ask God three times a day each weekday "to return with a tender heart to His city Jerusalem... and build it soon in our time for all time," we are really focusing our own hearts and our own minds on the work that is required to make that special place flourish.

Last month in Jerusalem, The CJN met with a man whose everyday preoccupation is the building of Jerusalem. His task is more than the literal building of the city, although it does include that, too, with attention to the city's stones, bricks, mortar, greening, gardens and infrastructure.

Mark Sofer is the newly appointed president of the Jerusalem Foundation. After some 30 years in Israel's diplomatic corps, most recently as ambassador to India, he has now brought his considerable inter-personal skills, international experience, scholarly erudition, suave manner and lifelong commitment to a Middle East at peace to the role of heading the foundation.

This storied foundation, Sofer tells The CJN, has an ambitious but indispensable mission. It "builds" Jerusalem through three broad categories of activities specifically related to enhancing various communities within the city, providing and encouraging cultural activities for its residents and fostering coexistence among its diverse peoples.

The foundation was established by Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek just before the Six Day War. The visionary Kollek created the foundation as a vehicle outside the framework of Israel's national or the city's municipal government to conscript men and women from around the world to the vital task of "building" Jerusalem.

Over these past four decades, Kollek's vision has proven effective. There are nine volunteer boards of activists in nine different countries outside of Israel on behalf of the foundation, including in Canada. Many of the volunteers are not Jewish. This isn't surprising given the sanctity of the city to the three major monotheisms in the evolution of western civilization across some five millennia.

"Jerusalem is not just any other city," Sofer notes wryly.

"It would be difficult to find another city in the world with the same level of challenges and complications faced by Jerusalem. What happens in Jerusalem has ramifications well beyond the city itself. It may be a new archeological find or the opening of a door in the Old City."

During his conversation with The CJN, Sofer repeatedly emphasized a special affinity he and the foundation have toward Canadian Jewry.

The multicultural mosaic that is the Canadian formula for inter-ethnic tolerance, mutual respect and coexistence provides a form of blueprint for much of the approach of the work of the foundation toward the city's many different populations.

"Jerusalem will not become an ethnic melting pot," Sofer said. "The different groups that comprise Jerusalem must and can live in harmony as a society.

"This sense of community building... is what Canadian Jews are all about, what the foundation is all about," he reiterated, pointing to the philanthropic generosity and to the in-the-field involvement by Canadians in a handful of key, life-enhancing initiatives of the foundation in the city. He highlighted Canadian participation in the "revitalization of the centre of Jerusalem," as a flagship project creating a place of engagement and belonging especially for the city's underprivileged or disaffected or simply down-on-their-luck youth.

Jerusalem Foundation president Mark Sofer

Sofer said that the standing order of the foundation is that "the urgent takes precedence over the necessary. Always. Jerusalem has to be and has to remain a living pluralistic place for all its residents. We cannot fail."

Whether or not it is his habit to say the daily prayer regarding the building of Jerusalem, there is no disputing that Sofer actually daily fulfils it, a partner along with the myriad other dedicated people, Jerusalemites and Canadians, too, each forces for good, striving to help God do His work on Earth.

Community speaks out at town hall meeting

Michelle Bitran
Intern

The average Jewish person in Toronto doesn't have much say in the priorities of the organized community, filmmaker Ben Feferman said at a town hall meeting he organized last month.

One of the repeated criticisms of organized community institutions made by the 40 people in attendance at the Barbara Frum Library May 24 was that large donations are being used to construct new buildings instead of going toward Jewish education and poverty relief.

Tuition costs for Jewish day schools are skyrocketing, leaving many families unable to afford Jewish education. "Maybe we [the Jewish community] have some issues with priorities," Feferman said.

Feferman, 28, added that while large Jewish organizations and charities such as UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, UIA Federations Canada and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs are well intentioned and do important work, they don't operate transparently and democratically, or allocate donations in a way that everyone in the greater Jewish community would agree with.

"To what degree are we able to cast a ballot to remove the leadership?" he asked the audience.

Wayne Levin, an engineer and day-school funding advocate who was one of three other speakers at the event, said it's not just the leaders of large organizations who can and should have an impact on community decision-making.

"We need to educate [people] and make people understand that they have a role to play," he said.

Feferman filmed the meeting as a part of his upcoming documentary that looks at the challenges facing Canada's Jewish community. He said he doesn't have concrete solutions, but hopes that the community can work together to find them.

The title of Feferman's documentary, Sha Shtil, to be released this summer, is a reference to the Yiddish phrase that means "be silent."

Feferman, whose last documentary, The Wandering Jew, explored the Jewish attraction to eastern religions, said the title refers to a prevalent attitude in Canada's Jewish community that encourages people not to speak up about issues.

He added that when he began filming, he was told several times by community members that he "can't talk about these things," and that he shouldn't outwardly challenge the way the community is run.

"The line that everyone gives me is that we shouldn't air our dirty laundry in public," he said.

However, as work on his film progressed, he found people more receptive and open to change.

"Change is not always going to come from the top," Feferman said. "It's not always going to be spoon-fed to you. It often has to come from the grassroots."

Feferman said he has never felt compelled to keep silent about problems he sees in the Jewish community.

"I'm not interested in making the Jewish community look good. I'm interested in making it do good."

In addition to Feferman and Levin, the meeting also heard from two other speakers, social worker and supporter of Toronto's homeless Lillian Freedman, and Israel advocate Esther Mendelsohn, who shared their experiences and offered opinions on where there's room for change in Toronto's Jewish community.

"There's lots of work to be done" to fight poverty in the Jewish community, particularly among seniors and Holocaust survivors, Freedman said, adding that "the good news is it's not hard and it's not expensive."

Rabbi's sabbatical leads to 'transition plan'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi John Moscowitz, bound by a confidentiality agreement, declined to comment on the recent brouhaha at Holy Blossom Temple – one of the world's best-known Reform congregations – and on what his role would be during his upcoming three-year sabbatical preceding his retirement as senior rabbi June 30, 2015.

In an April 24 letter to congregants, Holy Blossom president Mark Anshan – who is also under confidentiality restrictions – wrote that the rabbi and the temple's board had, "after many months of negotiations, reached an agreement" that Rabbi Moscowitz would serve as rabbi emeritus as of June 30.

Holy Blossom Temple

The 60-year-old rabbi – who has been with Holy Blossom for 25 years, the last 13 as senior rabbi – will be on sabbatical until his retirement, but will lead High Holiday Services at the synagogue in September, the letter said.

A followup letter from Anshan, dated May 8, said the rabbi's role and responsibilities would change during his sabbatical, but that he would "continue to keep his office, and officiate at weddings and funerals, if he is available."

Anshan wrote that "a comprehensive transition plan" was being prepared and that Holy Blossom would search for its next senior rabbi "in due time."

"We continue to be in good hands with Rabbi [Yael] Splansky, Rabbi [Karen] Thomashow, and Rabbi [Edward] Goldfarb," he wrote, naming Cantor Benjamin Maissner and cantorial soloist Lindi Rivers as well, among other non-clergy staff.

The letter began with comments that did little more than hint at divisions in the temple, which were highlighted in a May 25 article in the Globe and Mail. The newspaper article referred to "a bitter controversy [over] the de facto ouster" of the senior rabbi.

In his second letter, Anshan said the first one "did not properly reflect or recognize the dedication and contribution that Rabbi Moscowitz had provided to the congregation during his 25 years of service. I wish it had been otherwise. It was not my intention to upset any member of our congregation but merely to send out an announcement, the content of which was previously agreed to be a joint communiqué by the Temple's board of directors and Rabbi Moscowitz."

He credited Rabbi Moscowitz for building up the temple's adult education program, being with congregants at times of joy and sorrow, and "crafting a vision for the congregation's future."

Anshan noted in the letter that the temple board would be reaching out to members, and encouraged them to contact him. He wrote that he would respond to each e-mail and would be happy to meet members in person as well.

The Globe and Mail reported that the rabbi's sabbatical would be fully paid, and that his settlement was "said to be worth more than a million dollars... hammered out in protracted legal negotiations."

The article quoted temple member Senator Linda Frum accusing the board of mismanagement, and saying, "I am so upset about the way he has been treated. I feel so poisoned by the atmosphere created that it's not a place I could continue to feel comfortable. I know others who are leaving and others who are considering it."

The temple, which was founded in 1856, has seen a decline in membership in recent years to 1,950 family units. According to the second edition of the Ontario Jewish Resource Directory, published in 2001, it had 2,500 families at that time.

A congregant who declined to speak for attribution told The CJN that it's time now "for healing... It will take some time for that to happen."

A big step but only the first

The government of Israel announced last week, for the very first time, it would pay the salary of a non-Orthodox rabbi on an equal footing with an Orthodox one. In so doing, it conferred official state recognition on non-Orthodox rabbis serving non-Orthodox communities in the Jewish state. (Please see the related story in this edition of The CJN.)

The application of the government's new policy, however, was quite circumscribed. Only non-Orthodox rabbis in rural or farming communities are eligible for the salary funding. Their non-Orthodox colleagues who serve congregations in larger urban communities are not. In addition, the funding for the non-Orthodox rabbi comes from the Ministry of Sports and Culture rather than the Ministry of Religious Services, as do the salaries of the Orthodox rabbis.

Nevertheless, despite the narrow sweep of the government's decision, it was so entirely a departure from past policy that Natan Sharansky, chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, wholeheartedly praised it. "The government's decision to recognize Reform and Conservative leaders gives official recognition to these dynamic community leaders and rabbis who work tirelessly to build strong and vibrant Zionist and Jewish communities throughout Israel. I believe this decision has both practical and symbolic importance. It contributes significantly to the strengthening of the relationship between Diaspora Jews and Israel...and as another step towards bringing unity to the Jewish People."

With this small but weighty announcement, the government of Israel inched closer to more robustly honouring the promise to all its people, enshrined in the Declaration of Independence, to "guarantee freedom of religion."

And as Sharansky implied, the government has also very significantly strengthened the underpinnings of the bridges of peoplehood with the Jews of the Diaspora. For that very Declaration of Independence explicitly appeals to the Diaspora "to rally round the Jews of Eretz-Israel... in the realization of the age-old dream, the redemption of Israel."

There is in the government's announcement more than a faint echo of Neil Armstrong's dramatic statement 43 years ago when he became the first human being to set foot on the moon: "That's one small step for a man, one giant leap for mankind." Rabbi Miri Gold, a Reform rabbi from Kibbutz Gezer, who as of last week is now also being paid as a rabbi in the State of Israel by the government of Israel, could also validly say, "That's one small step for a non-Orthodox rabbi, one giant leap for Jewish religious pluralism in Israel."

But it was only the first step on that long, arduous road to official inclusion of all religious streams in Israel.

Inflammatory comments

I take exception to the inflammatory and offensive comments made by some in the article "Madrassah barred from Toronto public schools" (May 24).

David Spiro, of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, refers to the "dubious activism" of the madrassah's religious leadership, yet offers no explanation of the basis of this allegation. The madrassah's religious leadership is Islamic Shia Ithna-Asheri Jamaat (ISIJ) in Thornhill, Ont. As members of the MOSAIC Interfaith Group for more than 20 years, we have hosted some 150 to 200 group visits per year by students from GTA high schools.

We were the first Islamic organization in the GTA to condemn the 9-11 attacks in a joint press conference with our neighbouring synagogue, Temple Har Zion. When a Montreal Jewish school and an Islamic centre in Pickering, Ont., were hit by arson attacks, we issued a joint condemnation and made a donation to the synagogue. We are a founding partner with a Zoroastrian temple, a synagogue and a Christian church of the Out of the Cold program. And we are joint recipients of the Harmony Award with Temple Har Zion, in recognition of our promotion of Canadian values. Is this what Spiro considers "dubious activism?"

The article also quotes Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, who accuses the madrassah of teaching "antisemitic hate." Our record of decades of partnership with our friends in the Jewish community and with other religious and secular organizations speaks far louder than any baseless and inflammatory remarks made by vocal critics.

Nakba Day at Tel Aviv U

Rena Dvorkin Cohen says marking Nakba Day at Tel Aviv University was "disgraceful... an offence to Israel and its sovereignty" ("Nakba Day marked at Tel Aviv U," letter, May 24). For most of the 21 per cent of Israelis who are Arabs, Yom Ha'atzmaut may well seem like Yom Nakba. Does Cohen want to suppress their right to express their views? Now that would be "disgraceful" and "an offence"! I applaud Tel Aviv University's dean of students, who approved Arab students holding a peaceful ceremony. I applaud TAU's chairman, Moti Cohen, who said: "We are a democratic institution in a democratic country."

Anti-African violence in Tel Aviv

Terror recently raged in Tel Aviv ("Anti-African violence in Tel Aviv condemned," May 31). Preschool children were sent home for fear of attacks, and people were afraid to walk in their neighbourhoods. Who were the perpetrators? Jews. Their victims? African refugees. These refugees watched their families killed and their villages bombed, and escaped to Israel to preserve their lives. The Jewish nation cannot turn its back and say, "This is not our problem." We shouldn't even whisper such words, given our history of losing millions as other nations turned their backs. And yet, recently, Jews screamed these words as they violently marched through the streets of Tel Aviv. In the Knesset, Jews said these words as they put forth a policy to deport refugees to South Sudan, a move that could send thousands to their death.

LET THEM GO...

In 1944, David Ben-Gurion asked the international community, "If, instead of Jews, thousands of English, American or Russian women, children and aged had been tortured every day, burnt to death, asphyxiated in gas chambers, would you have acted in the same way?" I pose that question, too. If Jews, instead of Africans, thousands of Jewish women, children and aged were being threatened every day, attacked by Molotov cocktails, and facing the very real possibility of deportation to countries where they could be killed in a matter of hours, would you act in the same way? Or, should we confront our leaders and acknowledge that this is our problem?

The moral costs of Jewish day school

Rabbi Aryeh Klapper

There is a lot of hand-wringing these days about whether the rising costs of Jewish day schools are sustainable. The discussion has been about money: How can we get more? How can we spend less? These questions miss the point. The largest costs of high day school tuition are not financial but moral, and the key to solving the financial dilemma is to address the moral problem.

What are the moral costs? Imagine that someone proposes a new Jewish practice that would have these consequences:

- Parents take second jobs, or work longer hours, that deprive them of almost all weekday contact with their children and leave them too exhausted to make Shabbat meaningful.
- Almost half of all households are transformed, for years, from community contributors to charity recipients.
- Children aspiring to intellectual, creative or service work, such as teaching (especially Torah) or other helping professions, are told that these are not options because they will not produce enough money to sustain a committed Jewish lifestyle.
- For economic reasons, families choose to have fewer children.

We would consider such a practice stunningly irresponsible. Yet these are real-life consequences of current day school tuition, even as the community seems committed to making day school education a requirement of serious Jewish child-rearing. How can we live with these consequences?

Furthermore, parents receiving day school financial aid have no guarantee, and often no idea, of how they will be affected by tuition hikes or whether the school will take account of a job loss, a new baby, a car's breakdown – or, on the other hand, a gift from a parent or extra income from a second job. They cannot make future plans; they are chronically dependent on other people's decisions. They are deprived of economic dignity. Indeed, financial aid applications require families to state their expenses in often-humiliating detail. They know a committee will sit in judgment of their priorities. A family that eats pasta all month so it can go to a movie risks an aid cut because it spends on entertainment. A family that uses an inheritance to visit yet-unseen relatives in Israel risks a cut because it can afford travel.

The price of poverty is often the loss of privacy. This is an evil, which we should minimize. But the current system maximizes intrusions on privacy by forcing people who make five times the median income to apply for charity. Because the maximum tuition is unaffordable even for many families earning over $200,000 per year, they are forced into a financial aid system that requires complete financial disclosure.

The system also undermines the schools' Jewish effectiveness. If our children lack Jewish passion, doesn't that bespeak parental exhaustion? If they are materialistic, isn't this related to their being told that their career paths are limited because they are poor? When they show signs of being "at risk," doesn't this reflect lessened parental involvement? How can children internalize the core Jewish value of human dignity and the spiritual value of financial independence when their schools make them dependent?

Should we, therefore, undo our commitment – admittedly unprecedented in Jewish history and inconceivable in a less wealthy community – to broad-based day school education? This is not necessary. We can address the moral issues and, in doing so, the financial issues as well.

The Solomon Schechter School of Greater Boston has proposed a version of a model with great potential. In very simplified form, here is how it might work: tuition is set as either a fixed percentage of income – say, 15 per cent, with small adjustments for the number of children in the school – or a relatively high set amount per student, which high-income families can use if they wish to pay a lower percentage of their income. Families unable to pay even the 15 per cent could, as now, apply for financial aid.

This model corrects many of the current system's moral deficiencies:

- It makes the tuition-setting process transparent and predictable.
- It moves many middle-class families off the rolls of those receiving financial aid.
- It defines day school education as a public good to be communally supported instead of an individual good, privately purchased.
- It makes clear that the rich, even when they pay the maximum tuition, are assessed a lower percentage of their income than the middle class.

There are, of course, gaps and imperfections. The new system does not (yet) address families with children in multiple schools or questions of what costs should and should not be included in tuition. It also excludes, consciously, family assets. Yes, this exclusion could allow families to "cheat" by hiding their true financial capacity, but counting all assets would provide a disincentive to saving – and, equally important, would have critical implications for privacy and dignity.

No system is without drawbacks, but the proposed system's moral advantages are significant.

Still, let's be practical: the model will and should be required to pass the budget test. It should provide our schools with revenues at least equal to those of the present system. In fact, the new model would meet or exceed the test, if only because the percentage of income required as tuition can be set so as to produce approximately the revenues that schools receive now.

But the new system would have further budget advantages. Under the current system, schools operate under deeply flawed ideas about their revenues and their communities' financial capacities. They have arbitrary "financial aid budgets" for what they consider tuition "subsidies." They turn down students when these budgets are "spent" and they can no longer "afford" to take students paying less than full tuition. In fact, however, any student who pays a significant portion of gross family income will be contributing significantly more than the marginal cost of his or her education. In rejecting such students, schools forego revenues and profits. Moreover, notes Dan Perla of the AviChai Foundation, if a school sets tuition as a percentage of income during a recession, when costs rise faster than wages, it will realize rising revenues from the same percentage of income when times improve.

In addition, it is wholly reasonable to expect that the new system would change behavior. Families who do not consider day school under the current system, because of uncertainties or privacy concerns, may well consider it when they know how tuition payments will relate to their income and are required to submit only the first page of their income tax returns. Families with many children will be more likely to send them to day schools. Indeed, such families may grow larger over time. Wealthier and even middle-class families, who will no longer see their tuition payments as subsidizing their neighbours, may be more likely to donate. Families without children in the schools may also be more willing to donate if day school costs are presented as a communal obligation, not a commodity for purchase.

This new model requires elaboration and customization, but it can redirect the community's conversation and efforts toward a model of day school financing that is both financially and morally sustainable.

On a walk through Jerusalem

On the morning after Yom Yerushalayim, I walked past the prime minister's house on the way to the dentist. The house sits on Balfour Street, named for the British lord whose famous declaration of 1917 paved the road to the Jewish state. Half a century later, the Israel Defence Forces recaptured the Old City and unified Jerusalem, a momentous event commemorated on Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day).

A stroll in Jerusalem always inspires memories and invokes moral dilemmas. What does it mean to live in a city that's holy to three faiths and where virtually every street prompts historical analogies?

En route to the dentist, I recalled my first trip to Israel, in the summer of 1968. I landed on a Friday, and that same evening went for Kabalat Shabbat to the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Hillel House, then located on Balfour Street. At the end of services, the young congregants lined up to shake the hand of a fellow worshipper, an elderly gentleman. I asked someone who this was.

"You don't know?" he replied. "That's the president of Israel, Zalman Shazar."

That was the warm, informal Jerusalem I fell in love with, the capital of the Jewish People. In those days, every day was Jerusalem Day, a cause for proud celebration. But in recent years, the anniversary of the conquest has taken on a right-wing colouration that can foster extremism.

In 1968, it was commonly held that the dazzling victory of the Six Day War would lead forthwith to a two-state solution. Today, we have a bruising contest of values: manifest Jewish destiny versus modern Jewish democracy.

What will Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu do, now that the Kadima party has joined his government, affording him a luxurious 94-seat Knesset coalition?

Stuart Schoffman in Jerusalem

With history on my mind, I turned left from the prime minister's house and passed the Restobar café, previously known as Moment, where on March 9, 2002, 11 Jewish Israelis lost their lives in a Palestinian suicide bombing. I took the next right, heading up the street named for Haim Arlozoroff, the brilliant young Labour Zionist leader who was murdered on a Tel Aviv beach on June 16, 1933. Extremist right-wing Jews were arrested but not convicted. Their supporters blamed Arabs for the crime. The wounds are still open, the polarizations remain.

North of Ramban Street, Arlozoroff becomes Solomon Ibn Gabirol, after the 11th-century Judeo-Spanish poet and neo-Platonist philosopher who wrote in both Hebrew and Arabic. As I neared my destination, I thought of the historian Benzion Netanyahu, who died April 30 at the age of 102, and his 1,384-page study of the Spanish. Having actually read and reviewed the book in 1995, I can more or less ratify Time magazine's glib assessment that "Benzion believed that the history of the Jews is a history of holocausts," a grim outlook that has had a deep effect on his son the Prime Minister, and thus on the rest of us as well.

May we Israelis, then, be forgiven for not putting our trust in anyone but ourselves? Should we reject any whiff of appeasement of Iran and seize the rare opportunity afforded by Netanyahu's parliamentary consensus to strike a pre-emptive blow to thwart an Iranian plot to annihilate the Jewish state? Or, as many Israeli experts urge, should the prime minister place a new emphasis, from his position of strength, on achieving the two-state solution so essential to Israel's survival as a Jewish and democratic state?

These are heady questions to ponder on a simple walk. Better, perhaps, to reflect on Ibn Gabirol, who died in 1058, at the age of 37 or so. According to legend, he was killed by a rival poet, an Arab who was jealous of his prodigious talent. Attributed to Ibn Gabirol is a book called Mivhar Hapeninim (A Choice of Pearls), a collection of adages, one of which I committed to memory years ago: "Kol sin'ah yesh tikvah l'refuatah," begins the poet – "Every hatred may be healed" – "except," he continues, "for hatred that originates in jealousy."

A thousand years later, his words ring all too true. Can we possibly mitigate the jealousy that Palestinians feel toward Israelis? Or is this a problem suffered by a people who had their shot at statehood back in 1948 and blew it, and then repeatedly refused Israel's offers of compromise, and is therefore no longer our problem?

Netanyahu's opportunity

Eighteen months is a very short time in politics, particularly in Israel, but this is the window that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his new partners in the Kadima party, headed by former IDF general Shaul Mofaz, have to fix a wide range of problems.

In forging an alliance that includes 94 of the 120 members of the Knesset, they have prevented the political instability of early elections, but also created expectations that will be very difficult to meet.

For decades, Israeli politics has been largely frozen by a number of small parties that have exercised artificial power, resulting from the ability to bring down narrow coalitions. The immediate trigger that almost brought down the previous coalition was a court ruling that ended special exemptions from military service for the haredi sector. More broadly, basic changes in the relations between this narrow group and the wider population, the unjustified economic subsidies it receives, and the exaggerated political role of its rabbinical leadership are long overdue.

At the same time, the wider deficiencies in the electoral system that produced gridlock in many others critical issues will have to be addressed. Although Israel became a sovereign nation in 1948, the political process remained unchanged from the eastern European model used in the Zionist movement before independence. That system gives even tiny fringe parties a loud voice and leads to weak governments and frequent elections.

By raising the threshold for small parties and removing their veto power, as well as strengthening the position of the prime minister, the gridlock can be broken. To do this, a "super-majority" in the Knesset is required, and now, Israel finally has the right conditions to make these changes.

Wider economic reform is another immediate issue, particularly the need to reverse the growing divide between Israel's richest one per cent and the young and underpaid general population. The Jewish principles of social justice had become empty slogans, and last summer's student-led protests rightfully demanded affordable housing, improvements in public transportation and the break-up of monopolies.

On the complex issues of borders, settlements and negotiations with the Palestinians, the new government can belatedly confront the violent fringe that has sought to impose its views. The pragmatic consensus that recognizes the dangers to Israel of perpetuating the current chaos indefinitely can reassert its voice.

This doesn't mean a return to the vulnerability of the 1949 ceasefire lines or destruction of communities built in good faith across that "green line." But if Israelis see a basis for stable agreement, including an end to invented Palestinian histories and efforts to flood Israel with millions of third-generation refugees, the majority will accept the costs. And if such negotiations reach another dead end, a broad-based Israeli government can move toward implementing the consensus approach to borders and leave the Palestinians to decide how to govern themselves.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

A broad unity government anchored by Likud and Kadima – the two largest Israeli parties – will also have the legitimacy and stability to deal carefully and seriously with the wider regional challenges. If Iran continues to move toward nuclear weapons, all options are still on the table, and do not need to be spelled out again. The presence of three former IDF chiefs of staff in this government is, in itself, a form of deterrence.

In addition, given the unprecedented and unpredictable change in Egypt and Syria, Israel presents an image of stability and strength. New Egyptian leaders who might seek to divert public attention from economic and other issues by renouncing the peace treaty with Israel may now have second thoughts regarding the potential response.

This agenda is daunting, and if the grand coalition fails to bring change, Likud and Kadima will pay the price. At the same time, Netanyahu's skill should not be underestimated, as is usually the case. The fact that this political move took Israeli pundits by surprise demonstrates the degree to which he is viewed through a hostile and distorted lens. Many journalists are blind to the caution and deliberation with which Netanyahu has led Israel's fragile government in the past three years. Now, he has the opportunity to prove them all wrong.

Turkey's model minority

A valued and protected model minority during the Ottoman Empire and full citizens since the formation of a secular republic in 1923, the Jews of Turkey have enjoyed equality and respect, but have had to cope with periodic outbursts of xenophobia and racism.

Turkey, a pro-western state of 75 million inhabitants with the second-largest Jewish community in the Muslim world after that of Iran, treasures its centuries-long bond with Jews. As Turkish diplomat Ertan Tezgor said, "We have quite tight relations with the Jewish people."

Judging by the historic record, Jews have fared far better in Turkey than Armenians or Greeks, whose grievances can fill a book.

The Jewish presence in Turkey can be traced back to antiquity, to the Roman and Byzantine empires, when Greek-speaking Romaniote Jews settled in Anatolia, Turkey's heartland, and were eventually absorbed by Sephardi Jews, who reached Ottoman lands from Spain under duress in the 15th century.

Invited to the Ottoman Empire by the sultan, Mehmet II, Jews repaid the favour by being exceedingly loyal and productive citizens. Like all minorities, they lived within the framework of the millet system, which organized non-Muslim communities on the basis of religion.

Rifat Bali

With the breakup of the remaining segments of the Ottoman Empire, a cosmopolitan domain that reached deep into the Middle East and the Balkans, the number of Jews declined precipitously, from several hundred thousand in the 19th century to 80,000 by the conclusion of Turkey's war of national independence, which resulted in a Muslim/Christian population exchange.

In modern Turkey, founded by Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the revered father of the nation, minorities, especially Greek and Armenian Christians, were subjected to assimilationist policies and discrimination until the 1950s, according to Istanbul historian Rifat Bali.

In Eastern Thrace, Turkey's gateway to Europe, several thousand Jews in towns such as Edirne and Canakkale were forcibly expelled in 1934 in a campaign of physical violence, psychological intimidation and economic boycotts. The expulsions finally stopped when the central government intervened and allowed Jews to return to their homes.

Sheldon Kirshner in Istanbul

"It's not clear who was behind all this," said Bali. But right-wing nationalists sympathetic to Nazi racial doctrines may have been among the perpetrators.

In 1942, the Turkish government imposed a crippling wealth tax (Varlik vergisi) on well-off citizens. Historians generally regard the punitive tax, most keenly felt by Jews and Christians, as an attempt by the government to stop war profiteering and to transfer wealth to the Sunni majority.

Bali describes the tax, revoked in 1944, as a discriminatory and arbitrary measure that blatantly violated the 1924 constitution. In his view, the tax sent an unmistakable signal to minorities that they had no future in Turkey.

In 1955, following reports that Ataturk's ancestral home in Salonika had been destroyed, anti-Greek riots erupted in the centre of Istanbul, resulting in the destruction of numerous shops and homes. Jews and Armenians were caught in the backwash of this pogrom.

Five decades on, Turkey has matured and now has "a positive attitude to minorities," said Bali. But due to the events of 1934, 1942 and 1955, the pull of Israel after 1948 and an outbreak of terrorism in the 1970s, Turkey's Jewish community has declined numerically.

About 18,000 Jews, all but 400 of whom are Sephardi Jews, reside in Turkey today. Emigration is still a factor, with upwards of 150 Jews making aliyah every year. By one estimate, there are 100,000 Jews of Turkish origin in Israel.

By all accounts, the 1986 and 2003 bombings of Neve Shalom, the biggest synagogue in Istanbul, did not cause a significant exodus of Jews. The attacks, which were respectively perpetrated by Arab and Turkish terrorists, claimed the lives of more than 40 Jews and Muslims.

Turkish Jews are largely concentrated in Istanbul, with much smaller centres in Izmir, Bursa and Ankara. They possess an impressive range of institutions, synagogues and schools, but these facilities are increasingly difficult to maintain.

Demographic realities, notably an intermarriage rate ranging in the vicinity of 25 per cent and an aging population in which deaths outnumber births, are key problems in the community, said Izak Kolman, an advisor to Chief Rabbi Isak Haleva.

He and others believe that Jewish population stability will be assured by Turkey's vibrant economy and by Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's decision to bring in a new constitution enshrining human rights.

By local standards, Turkish Jews are fairly prosperous, being active in business (particularly in the textile trade) and the professions. Yet 200 families in Istanbul require food aid per month.

Traditionally, the civil service and the armed forces have been informally off-limits to Jews and Christians. However, Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu recently declared that Jews should be members of the diplomatic corps. Whether the new policy is merely tokenism remains to be seen.

Jewish leaders here claim that antisemitism does not pose a problem in daily life. But since most Muslim Turks have never met a Jew, "you have fear and negative feelings," noted Sami Herman, the community's president.

Antisemitic material is published in the ultra-nationalist and Islamic press, Bali observed. "But the sentiments they express reflect opinion in the street, and are not held by Turkish elites."

Although Jews are well integrated into Turkish society, ethnocentric Turks claim that only Muslims are real Turks, and that Jews are foreigners (yabancis).

The Mavi Marmara incident of May 2010, during which Israeli commandos stormed a Turkish ship trying to break Israel's naval siege of the Gaza Strip, may have contributed to the erroneous belief that Jews are faux Turks. "Jews feared that their loyalty to Turkey would be questioned," said Bali. "But no one questioned their loyalty."

By way of response, the Jewish community immediately issued an official statement expressing sadness and sorrow over the loss of life. Much to its relief, Erdogan issued a warning that anti-Israel feelings should not be allowed to spill over into antisemitism.

"We felt a little stressed, but there has not been a long-term impact on our community," said Herman, observing that the Mavi Marmara affair only affected Turkey's bilateral relations with Israel.

Although Turkish Jews tend to be pro-Israel, citing historical and cultural affinities with Israel, they tread carefully in public discussions about Zionism.

"We're not Zionists," declared Herman. "Not at all. But for sure Israel is very important for Jews."

Herman's colleague, Adil Anjel, put it more starkly: "In Turkey, Zionism is a bad word, like saying you're a racist."

He added, "We are Turkish Jews who feel sympathetic toward Israel."

Gala brings American political pundits to town

Michelle Bitran
Intern

The 2012 annual Spirit of Hope Benefit Gala held by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) broke all previous years' records, raising an astounding $2.58 million.

But it wasn't just the fundraising that made the benefit, co-chaired by Judy and Paul Bronfman, memorable. FSWC brought in well-known American political pundits for a spirited debate.

"The theme for this evening is based on one question, and that question is: has [U.S.] President Barack Obama made the world safer," said CNN chief political analyst Gloria Borger, who moderated the debate.

Democratic political strategist and campaign manager Donna Brazile and Democratic political commentator and media personality James Carville, arguing in favour of Obama, were pitted against past Republican presidential candidate and Fox News host Mike Huckabee and former deputy chief of staff and senior adviser to former U.S. president George W. Bush, Karl Rove.

More than 2,000 guests crowded into the Allstream Centre at Toronto's Exhibition Place on May 29, including many high school students invited by FSWC. The audience used a text-to-vote system, allowing them to use their cellphones to answer "yes" or "no" to the question of the evening.

The final tally showed a competition as tight as the current presidential race in the United States, with 51 per cent voting that the world is not safer under Obama, and 49 per cent voting that it is.

The topics of the debate ranged from the economy to Syria, Pakistan and, ultimately, to Iran and Israel. Both the Republicans and Democrats voiced support for Israel, although the Republican debaters were quick to state that they feel Obama has not been nearly supportive enough of the Jewish state.

"The policies of this administration have not been friendly to Israel," said Huckabee, criticizing Obama's policies on the Middle East. "I don't think Americans understand that Israel is fighting for its existence, not for its prosperity," he added, to loud applause.

Brazile responded, insisting that Obama has been helping Israel, both in the United Nations and through military funding. "President Obama has been tough. He has been relentless, and he has been a champion and supporter of Israel," she said. She also noted, to audience applause, that "Israel really doesn't have a reliable partner to make a peace deal at this time."

When it came to the issues of a nuclear Iran and to the violence in Syria, Rove called the president "naive," in his initial dismissal of the Iranian threat and in his strong opposition to any kind of military action. "This president walked away from the Iranian problem for some very vital years," he added, explaining that only with this summer's incoming sanctions, is Obama taking some appropriate action.

Carville disagreed with the Republicans' criticism, adding that the Middle East faces very complex issues that defy simple solutions. "I like a guy that thinks before he shoots," he said of Obama.

The debate ended without a firm winner, at least as far as the text-to-vote system displayed, but it served to entertain and enlighten the large audience. All parties finished their speeches by commending the work of FSWC in fighting racism and antisemitism in Canada.

Also that evening, there was a major gifts dinner and a concert by Canadian musician Kim Mitchell. During the dinner, FSWC honoured Lt.-Gen. Charles Bouchard, the commander of the NATO mission in Libya, as well as six other members of the Canadian Forces. Dean and founder of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Rabbi Marvin Hier, and president and CEO of FSWC, Avi Benlolo, also addressed the guests. The funds raised at the benefit will go toward education programs that are designed to counter antisemitism and racism and to promote human rights and social justice.

Organ donation: 'highest form of mitzah'

Jennifer MacLeod
Special to The CJN

"I am a very lucky lady. I am a miracle," Chaya Levinson says.

The 57-year-old nurse, mother and grandmother might have died of kidney disease six years ago if not for Mindy Halper, a fellow nurse but near-stranger who offered one of her two healthy kidneys.

"Just when the caterpillar thought the world was over, it turned into a butterfly," Levinson said at Beth Tzedec Congregation on May 22.

Yes! You Can Donate! was the theme of an evening on "Jewish Perspectives on Organ Donation" and sponsored, in part, by National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section, which has taken on the challenge of registering 200 new donors from the Jewish community.

Levinson, Halper and other speakers offered halachic, statistical and emotional views on the current organ crisis in Ontario. Some 1,500 people here desperately await organ donors, said Versha Prakash of the Trillium Gift of Life Network (TGLN), and although one donor can save up to eight lives and enhance 75 others, someone dies needlessly every three days waiting for an organ.

Eighty per cent of us support organ donation in theory, Prakash said, but only 21 per cent have registered their consent to be donors, and at 14 per cent, the GTA has one of the province's lowest rates of registration.

Rabbi Miriam Margles said that may be due to the inclination many of us have, when facing uncomfortable conversations, to spit three times and change the subject. Each speaker stood up hoping to change minds and open the door to those important conversations.

It's never been easier, Prakash said. Signing up at TGLN's website takes two minutes and requires only your health card. Even if you've already filled out an organ donor card, you should register there – cards are rarely available when needed, whereas the TGLN central database is available 24/7.

Prakash addressed myths surrounding organ donation. There is no upper age limit, for example, to be a donor: Canada's oldest organ donor was over 90. Others may fear that doctors won't work as hard to save the lives of known donors – this is not true, she said, because the TGLN database is confidential and only accessed at the point where saving the donor's life is no longer an option.

Many of the strongest objections, however, come from people who believe their religion does not allow organ donation. In fact, Prakash said, every major religion in Canada permits organ donation.

Offering Jewish legal background was Beth Tzedec's senior rabbi, Baruch Frydman-Kohl, who spoke of astonishing consensus: almost all movements not only permit, but praise the decision to arrange to donate organs while alive, and also to permit organ donation after death, a "gift to the deceased as well as to those who will continue to live."

Organ donor Mindy Halper
[Jennifer MacLeod photo]

The Rabbinical Assembly, the Conservative movement's association of rabbis, has said organ donation is "a new means to fulfil an ancient, eternal religious duty, a mitzvah of the highest order," while the Union for Reform Judaism, as far back as 1968, affirmed it as "a positive act of holiness."

It's true that a dead body has sanctity in Judaism, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said, mentioning the Israeli organization Zaka, which gathers human blood and tissue for burial following bombings.

"We have tremendous regard for the integrity of the body," he said. That's why we limit autopsies and conduct funerals as soon as practical. Yet, he added, "all rabbinic authorities came to an agreement – Orthodox, Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist, New Age, chassidish: preservation of life supersedes all prohibitions."

Heather Talbot, whose 22-year-old son was a passenger in a drunk-driving accident in 2009, said, "I never expected to be an advocate for organ donation… but I never expected to be a bereaved mother."

When Jonathon, a "smart, popular, happy, natural athlete," sustained irreversible head injuries, doctors asked the family if they'd consider donating his organs, Talbot said. "I didn't know if it was against my religion." Today, she helps educate others in the community.

UJA Federation says goodbye - and todah - to Consul General of Israel

Tributes pour in as Amir Gissin's five years in Toronto come to a close

By Daniel Horowitz

For the past five years, Jewish Toronto, home to more than 200,000 Jews of all backgrounds, has been fortunate to have Israeli Consul General Amir Gissin in its midst, allowing its citizens to benefit from his wisdom, leadership and knowledge.

Unfortunately, Consul General Gissin's term comes to a close this summer, and he will be returning to his home in Israel.

During his tenure as consul general in Toronto and Western Canada, Gissin worked tirelessly on behalf of the Jewish people, leaving an indelible impression in our community, and making his name synonymous with Jewish life in our city.

Recently, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto paid tribute to the consul general at a farewell dinner hosted by community leaders Julia and Henry Koschitzky, where more than 200 people came together to show their appreciation for his efforts .

"Every time you speak, you show us the heartfelt concern you have, not only for Israel, but for the Jewish people everywhere," said UJA Federation Board Chair Elizabeth Wolfe, who presented Consul General Gissin with an award on behalf of UJA in appreciation of his five years of service. "You have shared with us your commitment, your dedication, and your love for Israel and for our community, and we are forever grateful for that. Most diplomats spend the bulk of their time representing their government and a very small portion of time interacting with the local community. The reverse has been the case with Amir who has spent the bulk of his time getting to know our Jewish community, understanding our priorities, needs and concerns. It is Amir's ability to unite those concerns – from both the Israeli perspective and the local perspective - that has made him so successful here. We thank you for your dedication to our community. You have set the bar high, and we will all truly miss you."

"Amir had a mission when he arrived in Toronto and I believe he has achieved that mission which was branding Israel in a positive light," explained the hostess of the evening, Julia Koschitzky. "One of the ways he intended to do that was by showcasing how Canada and Israel are so much alike and by highlighting the positive aspects of Israel including its passion, its creativity, its innovation, and the incredible accomplishments it has made. He was also here for some contentious issues, whether it was those who tried to boycott the Toronto International Film Festival, or Israeli products, he was in the forefront, leading the way in combating this negativity and turned it around. In the process, he also rallied the community and, as a result, we were there to make sure it wouldn't happen again. We as a community have a responsibility to carry on his legacy."

"When you deal with Amir, you're getting the highest level of professional excellence that you'd ever want from a representative of Israel, and you're getting a person who really cares about his Jewish identity," said UJA Federation President & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "Amir has been an amazing partner for UJA Federation because one of the things we believe is that Jewish Toronto, as a community, has to show leadership in the Jewish world. Part of that leadership has to be at the forefront of the changing paradigm between Diaspora Jewry and Israeli Jewry. I can't think of a consul general who better understood the potential power of the Diaspora in forwarding the strategic goals of Israel, and vice-versa."

During the evening, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper praised Amir's efforts on behalf of both Canada and Israel, in a letter read by Shimon Fogel, CEO, The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

In the letter, PM Harper spoke of "Amir's efforts, and his role in the exceptional bilateral relationship, based on shared values, common interests, and strong political, economic, cultural and social ties," between the two countries.

Then it was time for the man of the hour to speak.

"This community has made me a better person," said Gissin. "Any achievements I have made are only because of the energy that was flowing from Jewish Toronto to me. Toronto will always be our second home. I feel that I was very privileged to be here during a time of great change. I think that what we achieved here, and how UJA Federation handled a number of challenges, showed the way to many other communities in North America and around the world. I'm sure that after I'm gone, you will continue to see that Jewish Toronto continues to lead the way."

Then, in a lighter moment after someone asked him about his future plans, Gissin quipped, "We are returning to Jerusalem where we plan on opening a small restaurant called Bathurst, in which we will only welcome Canadian customers."

Reena in the News

Reena

It is not often that we draw attention to acts of chesed or extraordinary merit performed by Reena staff members. However, this letter which we recently received from Franklin Simkevitz, Chair of the Beth Tikvah Foundation of Hamilton and former Chair of the Reena Foundation, is one which we feel should be read by readers of the Reena In The News column.

BETH TIKVAH (HOUSE OF HOPE) FOUNDATION OF HAMILTON
81 Arkel/ Street, Hamilton, ON L8S 1 N6

Dear Sandy:

On behalf of the Board of Directors of the Beth Tikvah Foundation, I am writing you to thank you profoundly for the helping hand that you and Reena extended to our organization in Hamilton when we were faced with seemingly insurmountable obstacles last year.

When we learned of our dire circumstances early last year, my immediate thought was to contact Sandy Keshen to discuss how Reena could help. Your reputation as a person with vision and the ability to deal with, and overcome complex issues made the decision simple. I also know you value the importance of having proper Jewish resources in place where Jewish communities exist. You truly are instilled with the spirit tikun olam (repairing the world). Reena's reputation as an excellent service provider on behalf of people with special needs provided the rationale to ask you and Reena to help us navigate the stormy waters. Our Board readily agreed.

The Beth Tikvah Foundation of Hamilton supports individuals from the community who have a developmental disability. While it is a small organization currently servicing six full-time residents as well as several outreach people, it is the only agency that supports Jewish families in the area and it is paramount that it continues to operate and provide programs for people with special needs within a Jewish environment and certainly within a kosher Jewish home.

The Board of Beth Tikvah truly appreciates how your Reena management group (from yourself through to the supervisors) stepped in to help. It involved travel to and from Hamilton. It also involved restructuring our house staff needs and instituting new training programs and procedures. We were impressed with their willingness to do this in addition to their ongoing work at Reena. Not only did Reena provide management services for the operation of our home and our programs, you also took on the task of financial administration of the Beth Tikvah Foundation. Without question, these changes brought us through some very dark times and we are now poised (with your assistance) to move forward to meet unaddressed needs in the community.

On behalf of the Board of Directors, the individuals and their families who are supported by Beth Tikvah and the Jewish community of Hamilton, I thank you sincerely for your positive leadership in the rescue of yet another agency in need.

Yours truly

Franklin Simkevitz, Chair
Beth Tikvah Foundation

Sivan: a month of peace and harmony

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein

Rabbinic Reflections

Let's learn to count according to the Kabbalah. One stands for absolute oneness, an effulgence of Godly influence that encompasses everything. There's no room for another perspective. All that exists is Him.

Two allows for the possibility of a different perspective, the existence of created beings who feel separate from Him. And three refers to establishing harmony and synthesis between the two views: that even those created beings who feel separate acknowledge and appreciate their unity with Him.

Three is different than one. On the level of one, there's no room for any other existence. His is the only identity felt. On the level of two and three, by contrast, the created beings are conscious of their own existence. On the level of two, they never really get past that. Even when they're conscious of the One above, their own identity determines who they are. On the level of three, however, although they're conscious of who they are, they transcend their individual identities and see themselves as part of a greater whole.

Nisan, the first month, is associated with revelation from above, miracles that transcend the scope of nature. The second month, Iyar, is associated with man's Divine service. For that reason, the entire month is associated with counting the Omer, which focuses on man's efforts to refine his character.

Sivan is the third month, when a synthesis between the two is created. This is achieved through the Torah, which fuses the spiritual and the material and establishes harmony between them, for the Torah speaks in material terms. Unlike the miraculous pattern of Nisan, it recognizes the natural order but teaches us not to rely on miracles.

Instead, the Torah places itself within nature, having exact requirements for the observance of its mitzvahs, focusing on the cycle of time and relating to all the details of our lives. Nevertheless, it relates to those factors on its terms. It doesn't follow man's conception of worldly existence, but instead sets its own pattern, defining the way man should live. Within the framework of mortal existence, man lives for a higher purpose than he possibly could on his own. He lives in God's world according to God's plan.

Although the above concepts are true, in our age, they require faith to be accepted. No matter how many times, we tell ourselves it's God's world, when we wake up in the morning and become conscious of our physical bodies and the material world around us, it's hard to appreciate the spiritual.

That's why the coming of the Mashiach and the era of Redemption are primary elements of our faith. At that time, the concepts we accept on faith will be seen as reality, and the world will be one with its inner spiritual nature and we'll identify with the Godly life force that maintains our existence.

For millennia, humanity has edged toward the fulfilment of this purpose. Our present generation, like dwarfs standing on the shoulders of past spiritual giants, can and must complete the task.

Fear of Food

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

There is a time-worn adage that we are what we eat. Food has always been a prime human concern. After all, we ingest it unfailingly three times every day.

Many and varied have been comments about food. George Orwell suggested that the secret of a successful restaurant is a sharp knife. Montaigne wrote that a man should not so much consider what he eats as with whom he eats. King James I ventured, "He was a bold man who first swallowed an oyster."

Oscar Wilde once said to a dinner companion: "If the soup had been as warm as the wine, and the wine as cold as the fish, and the fish as young as the maid, and the maid as willing as the hostess it would've been a good meal."

Harvey Levenstein, a professor emeritus at McMaster University, has written a number of informative and entertaining books about food, including Revolution at the Table: The Transformation of the American Diet and A Social History of Eating in Modern America.

In his latest work, Fear of Food: A History of Why We Worry about What We Eat (University of Chicago Press), he makes clear that what and how we eat has become increasingly entangled with false advertising, faulty research, government ineptitude and the greed of giant corporations.

In two vivid chapters, the author describes the widespread germ phobia of the 19th century that turned anxious, usually normal, citizens into fly-swatting fanatics.

The quest for nostrums is an old story. In the 1950s, Gaylord Hauser's opus Look Younger, Live Longer was a national bestseller. The author, handsome and oozing charisma, invaded Hollywood. His enthusiastic followers included Greta Garbo and the Dutchess of Windsor. Hauser endorsed five "wonder drugs": skim milk, brewer's yeast, yogurt, wheat germ and blackstrap molasses.

Vitamins, once widely hailed, are now viewed in the medical community as largely unnecessary. "High-quality studies have failed to show that extra vitamins, at least in pill form, help prevent chronic disease or prolong your life".

Does eating fatty foods lead to coronary disease? Twenty-one reports tracking 350,000 people found no association between them. As Edward Pinkney, a disgusted preventive medicine physician wrote, "The consumers understandable fear of heart disease and its impending death is being exploited by certain health groups as well as by an industry whose profits have more than doubled as a direct result of its implied promise that heart disease forestalled through use of its products."

And so it goes with fears about white bread, whole milk, butter, salt – and now sugar.

Recently, there have been widespread fears expressed about gluten. Researchers believe that only five per cent or six percent of those who claim to have gluten sensitivity actually have it. Some parents are eliminating gluten from the diet of their children, hoping it will be a cure for autism

Levenstein suggests that we remain skeptical about food claims. Advice? Eat a wide variety of foods and follow the rule of moderation. But don't deny yourself the foods you crave; such self-inflicted punishment is both foolish and needless. This is a necessary book, expertly researched and accessible, written with wit and verve.

IOC still rejects Munich remembrance

My View

Laurence Hart

In the early hours of Sept. 5, 1972, Palestinian terrorists broke into the dormitories where Israeli athletes were housed at the Munich Olympics. A wrestling coach and a weightlifter were gunned down as they tried to fend off the intruders, while nine others, taken hostage, would later lose their lives following a tragically bungled rescue attempt by the German authorities.

At the time, a horrified world looked on while the doyens of the International Olympic Committee (IOC) scrambled to salvage Games that many, including the local organizers, wanted to cancel. Nonetheless, while competition was suspended to accommodate a hastily organized memorial service and some athletes did opt to go home, for the most part, it was Olympic business as usual, right up to the closing ceremonies.

Even during the memorial service, then-IOC president Avery Brundage said relatively little about the Israeli athletes themselves, choosing instead to focus on what he considered to be the enduring strengths and resilience of the Olympic movement.

Unfortunately, the perceived insensitivity of the IOC has persisted well beyond Munich. At most Olympics since 1972, request after request to properly honour the slain Israelis has fallen on deaf ears. This Olympic year is no different. So far, appeals to the IOC oligarchy by the Israeli government, the Anti-Defamation League and two members of the U.S. House of Representatives have been summarily rejected. All that's being asked for is a minute of silence during the opening ceremonies of the upcoming London Olympiad.

But even so minimal a gesture seems to be beyond the IOC's reach. The formal response from current IOC president Jacques Rogge reflects his organization's usual pitch that "the IOC has officially paid tribute to the memory of the athletes on several occasions and will continue to do so in close co-ordination with the National Olympic Committee of Israel."

Such "co-ordination" presumably refers to commemorations that have been arranged by the Israeli Olympic Committee at private venues during successive Olympiads over the past four decades. Rogge has pledged to attend such a reception at London's Guildhall during the Games in July.

The IOC's position on memorializing the Munich Massacre is filled with platitude and inconsistency. What rumbles through, though, is an undercurrent of realpolitik, wherein it's speculated, at least by the two members of U.S. Congress who wrote to Rogge, that the IOC's greatest concern is that honouring the dead athletes might "risk alienating countries that have disagreements with Israel."

It should be remembered that in the immediate aftermath of the Munich killings, 10 Arab nations resisted joining the rest of the Olympic delegations in lowering their flags to half-staff, thus refusing to recognize the Israeli victims. Sadly, not much has changed in 40 years. An IOC that tolerated Arab intransigence then still seems to be appeasing anti-Israel sentiment today.

Maybe when Rogge and his cronies turn up at the Guildhall, they should be told that their token sympathy is no longer acceptable and then shown the door. Surely it's high time for the IOC to show some moral fibre, even if it's for just one minute, and at last offer a fitting public tribute to the athletes who were so brutally murdered in Munich.

Are the Olympics good for Jews?

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Next month, the world will be focused on London as athletes compete in the 30th Summer Olympics. While some Jewish thinkers have taken a critical view of the Games, others say we can learn a valuable lesson from the determination of gold-medal athletes.

The Jewish Encyclopedia provides some historical perspective in its entry, "Athletes, Athletics and Field-Sports." After looking at some "notable 'mighty' men" of the Bible (Jacob, Esau, Saul, Jonathan, David, Joab…), it focuses on the post-biblical era and attempts by some Jews to ingratiate themselves to King Antiochus Epiphanes by establishing "a gymnasium, modelled on the Greek plan, close to the Temple at Jerusalem, where men and boys might practise wrestling, boxing, ball-playing, throwing, slinging" etc. The backlash was a factor in the Maccabean revolt. [http://bit.ly/jolymp8]

The late Lubavitcher Rebbe was disdainful of the modern Olympics and their connection to the original Games. He was not pleased when he heard of plans to carry the Olympic Torch through Israel prior to the 1972 Olympics. "The whole point of Chanukah is the Jews' victory over the Greeks… Now they want to… resurrect this Greek custom, the opposite of the whole point of Chanukah!" [http://bit.ly/jolymp2]

In "Why the Olympic Spirit Lacks a Jewish Neshamah," Eliezer Segal suggests that "whereas Jewish objections to Greek sports were primarily due to their inherently pagan character (as well as to their immodesty and frivolity), the Romans introduced a new dimension to the arena: cruelty which even surpassed that of professional hockey." (Ouch!) Segal says that Israel's first chief rabbi, Abraham Isaac Kook, was a notable supporter of athletics. He believed in the importance of maintaining a healthy mind in a healthy body. That is, as long at the healthy body would permit Jews to better perform their religious duties. [http://bit.ly/jolymp1]

Rabbi Asher Meir of the Business Ethics Center of Jerusalem writes, "Many noted religious figures are and have been gifted athletes or avid sports fans. At the same time, Jewish tradition has the utmost disdain for violence and the violent urges." Sports like bullfighting have no place in our religion and "aggression is one of the few tendencies that Judaism does not strive to legitimize and elevate on an ongoing basis." [http://bit.ly/jolymp3]

Richard Greenberg says that Jews can learn valuable lessons from Olympics athletes. In "Olympics & Kavanah," Greenberg draws a parallel between the intense concentration that athletes use to visualize their goals and the kavanah – focus – used in the performance of mitzvot and recitation of prayer. But that parallel only goes so far. "In sports, winning is everything. But in Judaism, trying your very best can also get you to the medal stand." [http://bit.ly/jolymp4]

Rabbi Mitch Smith is a certified sports psychologist and founder of the Center for Sport and Jewish Life. [http://bit.ly/jolymp5] "To be the very best in life, we can take our cue from the gold-medal athletes. If we dream dreams for ourselves, if we summon the dedication and commitment to those dreams and take the steps necessary to achieve them… and if we cast our portion with something larger than ourselves, then we can hold our head proudly as we take our place on the gold medal podium of life." [http://bit.ly/jolymp6]

Vaughan mayor pledges $5K grant to Friendship Circle

Compiled by CJN Staff

Vaughan Mayor Maurizio Bevilacqua received a standing ovation at a recent event sponsored by the Friendship Circle when he announced a $5,000 grant to broaden the scope of a program that pairs teen volunteers with children who have special needs.

In his remarks, he praised the 130 teenagers who work in the program, sponsored by Chabad Lubavitch.

Since he began working in public office 25 years ago, he said, he has been aware of the work of Chabad Lubavitch.

The year-end celebration brought together government officials, Friendship Circle children, their families, the teenage volunteers and their parents.

Tribute was paid to the teenagers who dedicate their time to the Friendship Circle on a weekly basis.

"Tonight is one of our most important [gatherings], when we acknowledge the commitment and selfless devotion of the volunteers," said program co-ordinator Esther Grossbaum, who launched the Ontario chapter 10 years ago.

"This incredible group of teens spend time mentoring, shadowing or hanging out with their special friends, making sure to maximize the time they spend together while having fun," she said.

The volunteers wore royal blue monogrammed hoodies given to them as a token of appreciation.

Yehuda Benchetrit, MC for the evening, said he was introduced to the Friendship Circle 10 years ago by his older siblings who served as volunteers.

"When I was about eight years old, I went with my sister to her friend's house. I remember entering and seeing the beautiful smile light up the face of Andrea when she saw my sister. Ever since that day, I knew I wanted to volunteer for this amazing program.

"While this evening is a tribute to the volunteers, I am of the belief that we need to thank our special friends for giving us an opportunity and allowing us to build a connection with some of the most amazing individuals we will ever meet."

He thanked the Friendship Circle for helping him learn important values and teaching him the value of giving and the gifts of friendship he received in return.

Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum, executive vice-president of Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario, quoted the Torah, saying, "If, indeed, our commitment to a cause is genuine and not superficial, then one can scale a mountain with ease in pursuit of his objectives."

The mayor, Regional Coun. Michael Di Biase and Coun. Sandra Racco Yeung presented each volunteer with a federal, provincial and municipal citation of appreciation.

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

נס גדול היה כאן:

Sisters use lemonade to aid homeless

Michelle Bitran
Intern

For Jaime and Alexandra Eckler, lemonade is more than just a refreshing summer treat. It is a way to support Toronto's homeless youth.

The Eckler sisters, eight and five years old respectively, held their first lemonade stand four years ago, when they were barely toddlers. Their mother, Sharon Zohar, was inspired by the story of Amanda Belzowski, a 14-year-old girl who has raised more than $150,000 for the Heart and Stroke Foundation since holding her first lemonade stand as a two-year-old.

Zohar took the young sisters to Belzowski's annual lemonade stand, and Jaime immediately told her mother that she wanted to raise money the same way. But for the Eckler girls, it was important that the money go toward helping the homeless, particularly homeless youth.

"I like doing my lemonade stand because I like raising money for the homeless youth, and because I feel bad that they don't have any homes," said Jaime. Over the last three years, the Eckler sisters have raised about $8,000 to support the homeless, first for the charity Raising the Roof and, starting last year, for Toronto youth homeless shelter and support organization Eva's Initiatives.

This year, the goal is to raise another $8,000 at their upcoming lemonade stand event on June 23. The theme for this year's event is a carnival, and people who come out will be able to enjoy cotton candy, face painting, balloon artists, prize giveaways and, of course, lemonade.

Over the years, Jaime and Alexandra's Lemonade Stand has grown from a modest operation at the edge of their driveway to an all-out themed event taking place in a public park. The lemonade stand has garnered the support of sponsors, including Aroma Espresso Bar, the Jane Goodall Institute, Shoppers Drug Mart and Menchie's. This year, the Eckler sisters will also be joined by their lemonade stand inspiration, Belzowski.

Though Jaime and Alexandra are still very young, Zohar said they demonstrate a strong interest and dedication to the cause of homelessness. "They just are aware, that's the bottom line. They look outside of themselves," she said.

She explained that since first seeing a homeless person in downtown Toronto several years ago, the girls insist on offering food or simply stopping to "extend a hand and say hello" to any homeless person they see.

As Jaime and Alexandra grow up, they've been able to have more involvement and to add their own spin to their lemonade stand. "Every year, I really want them to grow more with it," said Zohar, explaining that Jaime now takes the responsibility of writing letters inviting city officials, including Toronto Mayor Rob Ford, to attend the event.

Alexandra, who has a special fondness for animals, has made the decision to raise additional funds at the event to go towards saving orphaned chimpanzees through Jane Goodall's chimpanzee protection program.

"This is very meaningful for them," said Zohar of the lemonade-stand initiative. She added that it's important to her that the charity work continues to resonate with her daughters.

Zohar asks the girls each year in earnest if they want to continue with the lemonade stand, in an effort to ensure that it is truly something that they find important. Each year, she said, the answer is the same, "they scream, 'Absolutely!'"

Jaime and Alexandra's Fourth Annual Lemonade Stand will take place at Woburn Park in Toronto on June 23 from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. For more information, contact Sharon Zohar at shazohar@yahoo.ca.

The Belzowskis raised over $8,000 with their own lemonade stand, please see page 28.

Students make unexpected discoveries in Israel

Brian Moskowitz
Special to The CJN

SASKATOON — A new program at the University of Saskatchewan is introducing aspiring business leaders to the international stage and creating connections with entrepreneurs and universities in Israel and Jordan.

Launched in April, Entrepreneurship and Mining in Israel and Jordan – an International Tour gave 16 Edwards School of Business students insight into Israel's dynamic entrepreneurial sector and a first-hand look at the international success of Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan Inc. (PotashCorp). The world's largest producer of fertilizer donated $50,000 toward the trip and sent its executive vice-president and chief financial officer Wayne R. Brownlee to join students in surveying the Middle East's potash industry – PotashCorp owns 14 per cent of Israel Chemicals Ltd. and 28 per cent of Arab Potash Company in Jordan, both major suppliers of fertilizer to Asia.

The 10-day tour held in May exposed students to the economic and cultural growth of the Jewish state and the importance of potash mining to Jordan's development.

After passing through security, the first-time visitors were anxious to begin the tour, but one student had other reasons for feeling nervous.

With the Islamic Republic of Pakistan's seal stamped on his Canadian passport, finance major Qamar Ahmed attracted the attention of Israel's border authorities, provoking a barrage of questions about family, friends and religion.

University of Saskatchewan Edwards School of Business students Qamar Ahmed and Dean Daphne Taras are seen in in Amman, Jordan.

"After the officer asked me if I was Muslim, I told her I belonged to the Ahmadiyya Islamic Community and came to visit our Haifa mosque. Once I mentioned that, she began to relax," Ahmed recalled.

Ahmed's great-grandfather, Mirza Bashir Ahmed – son of Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (1835-1908), believed by Ahmadis to be the Islamic messiah – travelled to Israel in the 1950s and established a community in Haifa.

"This experience at the Mahmood Mosque was unbelievable and humbling," Ahmed said, referring to the mosque built by the Israeli Ahmadi community in the 1970s.

Most Muslim countries regard Ahmadis as heretics and they are often persecuted for their beliefs.

"One of the local community members said Israel is the best place for practising Ahmadis," he said. "Even though the majority of the country is Jewish, people are allowed to be themselves."

Students also met with the Canadian ambassador to Jordan and the head of Arab Potash Company, and learned about the environmental situation of the Dead Sea from a senior lecturer at The Arava Institute for Environmental Studies. The most emotional experience for many of the participants was the visit to Yad Vashem.

A couple hours before Shabbat services at the Western Wall, participants discussed their impressions of the museum. One student, however, found it hard to speak.

"I was overcome with emotion," said management major Anna Burton.

About a year ago, Burton's grandfather found out his father was Jewish but had converted to Christianity in 1903.

"We went to learn about potash and entrepreneurship but returned with a lot of unexpected personal and cultural learning experiences," said Burton, who, along with several classmates, is thinking about a second trip to Israel.

"It's never a surprise to me when people find meaningful connections to Israel, whether because of religion, family background, etc.," said Dylan Hanley, director of Canadian Academics for Peace in the Middle East, which donated $20,000 and co-ordinated the trip.

Hanley is a non-Jewish academic who supports Israel and has led more than a dozen trips to Israel since 2007.

Despite the suspicious reception at Ben-Gurion airport, Ahmed's experience of the ancient and modern aspects of Israel – including test-driving an electric car at Better Place – changed his views about the country.

"Before I visited Israel, I had a negative opinion of it. But travelling really opens your eyes, and it's important to experience things first hand. Otherwise you're doing the country an injustice," Ahmed said.

Other sponsors of the tour included the Saskatchewan Ministry of Advanced Education, Employment and Immigration ($35,000), the University of Saskatchewan's President's Fund ($16,000) and The Hanlon Centre For International Business Studies ($8,000).

"No two people had the same response to the stimuli," said Daphne Taras, dean of Edwards School of Business. "It really affirmed that each individual who goes to Israel, finds different points of meaning, often in unpredictable ways."

Israeli does his country proud on Everest's slopes

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Late last month, the Toronto Star reflected on the mix of tragedy and triumph that has marked climbs on Mount Everest this season, one of the deadliest on record. Tragically, Canadian Shriya Shah-Klorfine died on her descent after having reached the summit. Triumphantly, in what the Star called an "act of raw heroism," one man's actions stood out: "A tough young Israeli, Nadav Ben-Yehuda, gave up his dream of scaling the summit this year when he was within 250 metres of reaching it to save the life of a fellow climber, Aydin Irmak."

Irmak, an American originally from Turkey, had lapsed into unconsciousness. Ben-Yehuda, 24, who had trained for two years and was poised to become the youngest Israeli to reach the top, instantly gave up his quest after spotting Irmak.

"Risking his own life," the Star noted, Ben-Yehuda "strapped Irmak… to his harness and manoeuvred him 1,000 metres down the icy slopes, past frozen corpses and amid violent gales and deadly cold. It took eight gruelling hours. In the Israeli military, 'you never leave a friend in the field,' he explained."

Israeli media reported on the extraordinary details. Though struggling in -40 Celsius winds, Ben-Yehuda had to shed his gloves, as they made the rescue too awkward, and proceeded without oxygen after having his mask break. Facing possible amputation of fingers because of severe frostbite, Ben-Yehuda later said he has no regrets.

While certainly an exceptional case of self-sacrifice, Ben-Yehuda's act reflects in broader terms a side of Israelis that few in the West ever read about.

Though other Canadian media outlets reported about this amazing human drama, the Star's decision to note it in an editorial stands out as a testament to Ben-Yehuda's care and courage.

In stark moral contrast, last week's revelations of the massacre of more than 100 Syrian civilians in Houla, including the horrific close-range shootings of scores of women and children, spurred media revulsion in editorials and other commentary.

Many, but not all, placed the blame squarely on Syrian President Bashar Assad, and more strongly than ever rebuked Russia (and China) for continuing to shield Assad in the face of mounting atrocities perpetrated by him in defiance of a UN "ceasefire" plan he supposedly accepted.

According to Alex Thomson of Britain's Channel 4 News (one of a very small number of journalists who managed to enter Houla in the days following the massacre and interview scores of witnesses), the Houla attack was carried out by the "Shabiya" – militia fighters operating under Assad's military.

Dressed in military uniform and numbering around 100, they were identified by the townspeople as having come from nearby Alawite villages. The force entered Houla just after Assad's military had shelled the town for several hours. The timing of their appearance is further proof (as if any is needed) that the Shabiya work as an arm of the Assad regime and not, as some journalists who were not even in the country reported, as members of "civilian gangs" (implying rogue elements for which Assad is not responsible).

As to Russia (which, along with Iran, supplies Syria with arms), Moscow's support of Assad reached a new level of callousness in the aftermath of the Houla massacre. Speaking alongside British Foreign Secretary William Hague in Moscow, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov appeared to trivialize the atrocity, saying that since it takes "two to dance," rebel forces must assume their share of responsibility. (Compounding the insensitivity of his analogy, he decided to clarify that what he really had in mind was not "the tango" but rather "disco" since "several dozens are taking part.")

According to a Guardian news report of Lavrov's comments and related events, a "prominent" independent Russian journalist, Vladimir Varfolomeyev, disgusted by his country's actions, wrote: "We will not forget that Assad's crimes became possible because, in part, Russia did not allow the [UN] Security Council to take tough decisions on Syria in the spring… We are accomplices."

Rabbis outline same-sex marriage guidelines

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Rabbinical Assembly's committee on Jewish law and standards – the Conservative movement's highest legal body – unanimously voted last week on guidelines that outline how to perform same-sex marriages.

These guidelines, which are officially sanctioned by the Conservative movement, were passed May 31 by a 13-0 vote, with one rabbi on the committee abstaining.

Rabbi Elliot Dorff

The new ritual guidelines were presented by rabbis Elliot Dorff, Daniel Nevins and Avram Reisner six years after their paper, which allowed commitment ceremonies for same-sex couples, as well as the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis, was endorsed by a majority of 13 votes.

Although the ritual committee officially sanctioned gay relationships in 2006, it stressed that rabbis were permitted, but not obligated, to perform such ceremonies.

Rabbi Howard Morrison, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, explained that when the ritual committee "issues more than one position, or at times even a single position, there is no enforcement on the rabbinate to follow the position or positions rendered. The role of the [committee] is to render opinions. As such, a colleague is free to accept or reject the opinion or opinions of the [committee]."

The new ritual guidelines offer two types of gay weddings and outline policies on gay divorce.

Rabbi Nevins told the Jewish Daily Forward that both versions of the same-sex wedding ceremonies are egalitarian.

"They differ mostly in style – one hews closely to the traditional wedding ceremony, while the other departs from it," he said.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover of Beth Tikvah Synagogue said it's important to note that the guidelines refrain from calling the ceremony kiddushin.

He said the ritual committee made a clear distinction between a same-sex union and a traditional, heterosexual one.

In traditional weddings, kiddushin, when the groom presents the bride with a ring, is regarded as the moment an act of marriage has occurred.

"Kiddushin is reserved for marriage between a man and a woman… They called [the same-sex ceremonies] marriage, because it is a secular word, but the Jewish word has very important implications," Rabbi Grover said.

Rabbi Nevins said the templates detail a ring exchange that is based on Jewish partnership law, an established halachic concept.

Although Rabbi Grover doesn't perform same-sex unions, he said these guidelines were necessary to address concerns and answer questions about how to move forward.

"They had to do this. Even me, who is opposed, I have to admit that this is a hole that existed in the paper, and if you're going to allow it, you better explain [how to do it]," Rabbi Grover said.

"I remember when this was discussed – I was still in seminary in 2006 – and I remember the students saying, 'Well, what do you mean we permit same-sex marriage ceremonies? What does that look like?'" Rabbi Grover said.

He said that since Conservative rabbis started performing same-sex marriages, they have had to come up with their own ideas of what a ceremony should entail.

"I'm glad there are at least these guidelines for my colleagues who do choose to perform these ceremonies."

Despite this new development, Rabbi Grover doesn't anticipate a big change in the way Conservative rabbis in the Toronto area handle the issue.

"Before this paper, if you were opposed to the Jewish religious sanctification of same-sex marriages, this paper is not going to change anything for you, as it doesn't for me," he said.

Rabbi Martin Berman, spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Synagogue, said that although the 2006 paper was endorsed, it's not necessarily halachic.

"From my perspective, just because some people say something is halachically permitted, without any basis on Jewish tradition to make that stand, I find that questionable," Rabbi Berman said.

"We all believe in the dignity of human beings and we believe that everyone has, in a democratic society, a right to choose what they want to do in their lives. Those of us who come from a more traditional spectrum of Jewish tradition certainly feel the pain of those who are in this situation, but unfortunately, not every situation can be resolved in a way that makes everyone happy."

Bnei Akiva students learn about philanthropy

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Adina Tanen, a student at Ulpanat Orot, says that she and her friends Kayla Shields and Devorah Green were "really inspired" by their participation in the Youth and Philanthropy Initiative (YPI), a program for high school students founded by the Toskan Casale Foundation.

As part of their Grade 10 careers course this year, the girls researched and won $5,000 for Camp Oochigeas, which serves children with cancer. Their presentation on "Camp Ooch" was the winning entry for Ulpana, based on a vote by student peers.

The girls' male counterparts at Yeshivat Or Chaim won $5,000 for Circle of Care's Meals on Wheels program. The two branches make up Toronto's Bnei Akiva Schools.

Noam Cotton, who worked on the winning project with his friends Aaron Zeifman and Adin Pellow, said participating in YPI made him more aware of services that people use.

A May 24 event at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre that brought together YPI participants from across the province to hear motivational speakers was one of the most moving experiences of his life, he added. As a student at the only Jewish school to be involved in the program, he said it was "incredible to be part of that."

The school has been involved in YPI since 2007.

The program, which began in 2002, is a project of a family foundation launched in 2001 by the founders of MAC cosmetics to support community-based grassroots organizations. It has given more than $5 million to Canadian social service charities since its inception, and has engaged more than 100,000 students internationally.

Ulpana's assistant principal, Shari Weinberg, who teaches the careers course, introduced the YPI to the school.

"Our kids know about it and are so enthusiastic, and put a great deal of work into it," she said. She added that the hands-on program involves site visits.

Every year, about half her students research Jewish organizations, and about half focus on non-Jewish charities, Weinberg said. "I think it's been a wonderful program for the class [and] also for the entire school."

In addition to the Grade 10 students' involvement, she noted, "one of the things that happened [is that] they continue to have a relationship with their charity of choice."

A mother-daughter night at the school earlier this year raised more than $2,000 for Bikur Cholim, the Jewish Volunteer Service of Toronto, a charity that students researched as part of YPI two years ago.

Hannah Samuels, one of the Grade 12 students who prepared a presentation on Bikur Cholim, told The CJN that even though her presentation didn't win the $5,000, YPI "definitely had a big influence" on her. Last year, she started a program through the organization, for students at her school to call isolated seniors every Friday. The program is still ongoing.

"I've always been interested in helping the community," said Samuels, whose father, Frank, is principal of the school. "YPI allowed me to see with my own eyes how much people can help even with limited resources. It really inspired me to do whatever I can to help the community."

Michael Teversham, who teaches the careers course at Or Chaim, said YPI "opens students' eyes to a world they haven't been exposed to."

Tanen agrees. Previously, she had only been involved with Jewish charities, and hadn't heard about Camp Oochigeas. "We knew we wanted to do something with kids," she said. "Kids are so fun, and we feel connected with that. We were so moved and inspired… That $5,000 could change a kid's life, and give them hope."

JNF brings Negev Dinner to SW Ontario

— Hamilton, London, Windsor —

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Hamilton's Jewish National Fund is celebrating 60 years of Negev Dinners on Sunday at the Hamilton Convention Centre.

The Negev Dinners, which are held in 10 Jewish communities across the country each year, raise funds for JNF projects in Israel, while honouring both Jewish and non-Jewish inspirational community leaders.

This year, the Hamilton community will honour Larry and Jacki Levin, who have immersed themselves in the organized Jewish community in Hamilton for the past 30 years.

"They are very committed and involved people," said JNF Canada director Franklin Simkevitz.

Larry and Jacki Levin

But Larry Levin, who carved out a successful career as a dentist, and currently sits on the board of the Canadian Dental Association, said getting involved in the Jewish community came naturally to him and his wife Jacki.

"We didn't set out to make our involvement in Jewish life a priority. We moved into the community from Toronto. Our kids got involved with the Hebrew Academy School and I had an opportunity to sit on the board… That was one of our first entrees into the Hamilton Jewish communal life," Larry said.

Around the same time, his wife became president of the parent-teacher association.

"That was about 30 years ago. From there we continued to be involved at different levels. I was asked to be involved with the [UJA Federation of Hamilton]… I was on the board of federation and later became president."

Larry still sits on the federation board with Jacki, who served as the Hamilton federation's treasurer for two years.

In the late 1990s, Jacki joined the board of Shalom Village, a Jewish long-term care facility, and later served as president for three years. While she continues to sit on the board, Larry has taken over as the Shalom Village president.

"We both always felt we wanted to make a contribution, we wanted to set an example for others and we got so much out of our involvement," Larry said.

"We always wanted to try to improve things and that's the way in which you can. You can get involved rather than being critical… roll up your sleeves and make the difference."

The June 10 event, which is expected to attract more than 500 people, will include a keynote speech by Rex Murphy, a Canadian commentator, author and journalist, who appears on CBC's The National, host's CBC Radio One's Cross Country Checkup, and has a regular column in the National Post.

Simkevitz said dinner guests will also be treated to a special video in honour of the 60th anniversary of Negev Dinners in Hamilton, which will highlight past honorees, as well as the projects that the dinners have helped fund in Israel such as water reservoirs, forests, research and development projects, and Zionist educational projects.

Simkevitz added that attracting 500 guests in a small Jewish community like Hamilton, which has less than 5,000 Jews, is quite a feat.

"Windsor is another city that attracts hundreds to the dinner from a much smaller pool of only about 1,200 Jews."

The Windsor event on June 20 will honour Frances and Jerry Goldberg. JNF Windsor board and executive members. Jonathan Tepperman, journalist and managing editor of Foreign Affairs, and former deputy editor of Newsweek, will deliver the keynote address.

Simkevitz added that about half of the dinner guests are non-Jews who resonate with JNF projects.

"It's got a cachet in each of these communities. It attracts people from the general community, people who are supportive of Israel and supportive of the Jewish community."

The JNF dinners also often celebrate non-Jews who benefit the lives of Canadian minorities.

For example, on June 24, London's JNF will honour the Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney.

"Jason Kenney is being recognized in part for his outspoken support for the Jewish community and Israel," Simkevitz said.

"Recently, he's been first off the mark to condemn antisemitism… and he's also been outspoken in his support for Holocaust education."

The dinner, which will be held at the London Convention Centre, will also feature a musical performance by singer Aviva Chernick and her band Jaffa Road.

The Levins agreed that supporting JNF is a worthy cause on many levels.

"We support what JNF stands for, the opportunities it creates for people in Israel to improve the environment in Israel, and the wonderful message it sends to people around the world about green and environmental issues that JNF is always working towards."

But the main message, Larry said, is that volunteerism is vital to maintaining thriving communities.

Prenups now required at two Orthodox shuls

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Couples who want to marry at two traditional synagogues in Montreal will now be required to sign a halachic prenuptial agreement.

The rabbis of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim and Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem (TBDJ) have pledged to only officiate at weddings where the bride and groom have first agreed that, if they ever seek a civil divorce, he will give her a get – a Jewish divorce decree – and she will accept it.

Rabbi Adam Scheier

TBDJ is affiliated with the Orthodox Union, while Shaar Hashomayim is officially independent of any denomination but Orthodox in many of its practices.

Rabbis Adam Scheier and Yonah Berman, respectively, senior and associate rabbis at Shaar Hashomayim, and Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of TBDJ are members of the International Rabbinic Fellowship (IRF), an association of modern Orthodox rabbis that has adopted this policy.

On May 22, at the IRF's annual conference held in Washington, D.C., its 150 members voted "overwhelmingly" in favour of the resolution, according to a statement the organization issued.

The resolution further encourages, but does not require, members not to participate in any wedding ritual where no prenuptial agreement exists. This means not reading the ketubah, serving as a witness or making one of the Sheva Brachot, for example.

The IRF, which was founded in 2009, called the resolution "a historic step to prevent further agunot," women who are unable to remarry within traditional Judaism because their ex-husbands have not given them a get.

"The IRF is now on record as the only Orthodox rabbinical organization in the world to require its members to use a halachic prenuptial agreement in any wedding at which they officiate," said its president, Rabbi Joel Tessler, senior rabbi of Beth Sholom Congregation in Potomac, Md., and an executive board member of the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA).

"This is a critical part of our ongoing efforts to help eliminate the tragedy of the modern-day agunah situation."

In practice, little will change at the two Montreal synagogues. Rabbi Scheier has required a prenuptial agreement at all of the 20 to 30 weddings he conducts on average each year since he joined the Shaar Hashomayim in 2005. The shul, however, has no written policy on the matter, he said.

Rabbi Scheier said most modern Orthodox rabbis in Montreal also require a prenuptial agreement. "I have encountered no resistance, but I have heard of some grooms or families [balking at entering such an agreement]."

The importance of the IRF resolution, to Rabbi Scheier's mind, is that it is a "principled position" that reinforces the message that denying a former spouse (it's usually the woman) of a Jewish divorce is unacceptable and has "devastating" consequences.

In Montreal, there is no standard prenuptial agreement that is halachically acceptable. Rabbi Scheier said modern Orthodox rabbis here use a number of adaptations of one developed by the RCA, in consultation with divorce lawyers and other experts, suitable for the Canadian context.

Whether compliance with a halachic prenuptial agreement can be enforced is less clear. The remedies within the Jewish community are limited and are questionable in civil law.

Rabbi Scheier said he could not offer a legal opinion on how Canadian courts might regard such agreements.

"Their legality has not been fully tested," he said. "This is an important, but not final, step in the resolution of the agunot issue."

Rabbis Scheier and Steinmetz are board members of the IRF, which was founded by American rabbis Avi Weiss and Marc Angel. The IRF has members throughout the United States, seven in Canada, and some in Israel and elsewhere.

Among the other members in Canada are Rabbi Howard Joseph, rabbi emeritus of Montreal's Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue; Rabbi Aaron Levy, founding director of Makom: Creative Downtown Judaism in Toronto, and Rabbi Martin Lockshin, a York University humanities professor and writer.

Rabbi Lockshin said the resolution represents an important moral stand, but experience has shown that the existence of a halachic prenuptial agreement does reduce the likelihood of a get being refused, or at least, not for an extended period.

"The Beth Din of America, whose prenuptial agreement is the most commonly used, claims that where a couple has signed such an agreement, the longest it has taken [for the get to be issued and accepted] is nine months. So it is having an impact on cutting down the agunah problem."

Rabbi Lockshin, volunteer rabbi of the Toronto Partnership Minyan, said he performs about two weddings a year.

"The first thing I tell the couple is that I will not conduct the wedding without the agreement. I give them a copy and suggest they consult a lawyer, if they want."

Although there has been no court challenge, he said it appears that "just having the threat over their heads has been effective so far."

Refugee claimants will get IRB hearing

He faced harassment and threats after making controversial statements last summer about Hungary's role in the Holocaust, the Hungarian News Agency reported.

He claimed "a political campaign" had been mounted against him by Budapest City Hall and also "from within the government and parliament."

Writing in the American Hungarian-language newspaper Amerikai Nepszava, earlier this year, Kertesz said Hungarians alone can now be blamed for the Holocaust in their country, because unlike the Germans, they have failed to admit to and repent for their crimes.

He also said that the current right-wing government in Hungary has "launched a witchhunt and fuelled the extremists" and that he has been "subject to constant harassment and threats." He said he was attacked in the street and that his life would have been in jeopardy if he stayed in his homeland.

Kertesz's Montreal lawyer, Mitchell Goldberg, wouldn't comment on his client's case, but said there were problems with Bill C-31 when it comes to Hungarian and Jewish refugee claims.

Ana Curic, Kenney's director of communications, said that under Bill C-31, all refugee claimants, regardless of country of origin, will continue to receive an IRB hearing on the merits of their case.

"Bill C-31 will benefit genuine refugees, as they will receive Canada's protection in a matter of a few short months, compared to the current system, in which they must wait an unacceptable two years," Curic said.

Last month, Kenney amended the bill to allay opposition MPs' concerns that it would unduly punish refugees with long detentions prior to the government reviewing their claims.

Instead of a 12-month detention for refugees who arrive "irregularly" to Canada, Bill C-31 now proposes a mandatory review after 14 days, followed by reviews every 180 days.

Additionally, the bill also now incorporates a provision that will allow the minister of public safety "on his own initiative and at any time" to release a detained individual when grounds for detention no longer exist, according to the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration website.

"We have listened to parliamentarians on Bill C-31 and, as a result, we have a stronger bill that will continue to protect genuine refugees, while ensuring that bogus asylum seekers are detained, processed, and swiftly removed, and sending the message to human smugglers that targeting Canada will no longer pay," Kenney said.

But Maureen Silcoff, a Toronto lawyer and former member of the IRB, said Bill C-31 is still problematic.

"As a politician, Minister Kenney should not be deciding which refugee claims have merit, and which don't," she said. "That's for an independent tribunal [like] IRB to decide, in my opinion."

Silcoff also believes Kenney is targeting Roma applicants unfairly. She said she represents "hundreds" of Roma asylum-seekers from Hungary and the European Union, and the current cases she's seeing are very strong

"There's a growing fascist movement in Hungary in which Roma and Jews are being targeted" for persecution, she said.

She said so far, Hungarian Roma have been more affected, as they are a more visible minority than Jews.

"But when [Hungarian] Jews are dressed visibly, there have been many human rights reports" of attacks on Jews.

However, the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration said no countries will be automatically designated as "safe."

Bikers raise money for Holocaust education

Michelle Bitran
Intern

It's not many events that will bring 400 Jewish motorcyclists to one place, but the Jewish Motorcyclists Alliance's (JMA) annual Ride 2 Remember managed to do just that last week.

The Ride 2 Remember is a yearly motorcycle tour that brings together Jewish biker groups from all over the world to raise money for Holocaust education. This year, the eighth annual ride was the first one to take place in Canada.

Despite the stormy weather, the ride had record attendance, with hundreds of bikers from Canada, the United States, Israel, England and Australia touring through the streets of Toronto to raise funds for the Holocaust Educator Study Tour. The program, which operates through the UJA Federation's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, works to bring non-Jewish teachers to the sites of the Holocaust in Europe and to teach them the tragic history of the Holocaust in a meaningful way.

"They will come back to their schools and impart their knowledge on their students," said Gadi Prager, president of Toronto's Yidden on Wheels (YOW), who hosted this year's event. Prager stressed the importance of educating teachers about the Holocaust because of their ability to share the message with so many young people.

Jewish motorcyclists braved a downpour in Toronto last week

So far, the Holocaust Educator Study Tour, which is offered to 30 participants at a time, has had the funding to run in 2005, 2008 and 2010. The Ride 2 Remember fundraisers hope it will become a more frequently run program with their support.

The enthusiastic riders, clad in leather outfits stitched with group names like the "Chai Riders," "Lost Tribe" and "Riders of Israel," began their biking journey on May 31 in Ottawa. There, they met up with Christian motorcyclists at Parliament Hill for a "Never Again" pledge, organized by YOW.

The JMA motorcyclists then made their way to Toronto for the Ride 2 Remember the following morning. The ride kicked off at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, and, due to the wet and dangerous weather conditions, followed a shortened path with police escort to Holy Blossom Temple for a celebratory lunch.

"This is truly an authentic Jewish biker experience," YOW's Stephen Stein, the chair of the 2012 Ride 2 Remember organizing committee told the crowd at Holy Blossom. "We went to Shaar Shalom, we ate breakfast, we thought about what to do next and we came to lunch," he said with a smile.

Among the speakers that afternoon were Susan Jackson, the executive director of Women's Philanthropy at the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Amir Gissin, the consul general of Israel in Toronto and Western Canada.

"Riding a bike is probably the ultimate expression of freedom in western culture," said Gissin, adding that the annual ride is a powerful and important opportunity for free people to remember those who lived without freedom.

"We have to make sure that it's not just us who remember, but that it's everybody else."

Progressive Zionist group calls out QuAIA

Compiled by CJN staff

Canadian Friends of Peace Now (CFPN) has denounced an anti-Zionist group's plans to take part in the 2012 Toronto Pride festivities and called on city council to withhold funding to Pride Toronto if groups hostile to Israel are allowed to participate.

Late last week, the progressive, Zionist CFPN issued a statement against Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA), a gay and lesbian activist group that has accused Israel of being an apartheid state and of "pinkwashing" its image by boasting of its treatment of gays and lesbians.

Peace Now said QuAIA practises "cheap anti-Zionism" and should not be allowed in the July 1 Pride Paarade.

The city is scheduled to grant nearly $104,000 to Pride organizers for this year's events.

"While CFPN has long argued against Israel's occupation of the West Bank, we find [QuAIA's] fierce attacks on Israel to be highly suspect," the nonprofit group said in a statement.

"Surely QuAIA must know that Israel is the only state in the Middle East which extends a measure of tolerance to the LGBT community. It would make more sense for the group's Pride banner to read 'Queers Against Arab Homophobia.'"

QuAIA did not take part in Toronto's 2011 Pride week, bowing to pressure from Pride organizers and the gay community to ensure city money flowed to the festival after an acrimonious public debate threatened to see the city cut its funding.

Pride Toronto also instituted a new dispute-resolution mechanism last year as a result of the controversy surrounding QuAIA's participation in prior parades.

A dispute-resolution committee made up of legal experts and community members has been empowered by Pride Toronto to examine any complaints against parade applicants and decide whether they can officially participate.

As of The CJN's deadline, QuAIA had not yet applied to be in this year's parade.

Meanwhile, Toronto City Council was scheduled to vote on Pride funding at its June 6 and 7 meetings.

Last year, the city had considered a motion to withhold funding from Pride until after the festival to make sure that QuAIA would not be allowed to participate. It was unclear whether council would consider a similar motion this year.

In 2011, council ordered city manager Joseph Pennachetti to report on whether QuAIA's messaging violated Toronto's anti-discrimination bylaw.

Pennachetti's report ruled that the term "Israeli apartheid" did not constitute hate messaging under city bylaws, since the term had never been judged to be hate speech by a court or tribunal.

Jewish and pro-Israel groups have so far been reluctant to bring the matter up in court or at the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

Montessori method helps people with dementia

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

A children's educational program, developed more than 100 years ago by Dr. Maria Montessori, and recently adapted for people with dementia, has vastly improved the quality of life for some residents of L'Chaim Retirement Home.

Since introducing the Montessori method for dementia to the Sheppard Avenue West home this past winter, owner Judy Cohen says she has seen a remarkable change in many residents.

About 90 per cent of L'Chaim's 30 residents have dementia.

With the help of consultant Carol Saba, who is trained in the Montessori method for dementia, said Cohen, the entire home – all staff attended a two-day workshop – has embraced the method, and has changed the approach in which they deal with residents.

"By engaging residents in meaningful activities, we are seeking the person behind the dementia," she said.

Upon entering the home, changes are evident, said Cohen. "We've painted murals on entrance and exit doors so instead of being enticed to escape through the doors, residents admire the art work."

Saba said there is a lot of environmental cuing. They bypass declarative memory, the recall of facts and knowledge, and concentrate on procedural memory, the act of doing something. "Procedural memories [are often] retained after declarative memory is lost. Many tasks, such as reading, can be retaught."

"We post daily schedules, which remind residents of tasks such as bathroom visits or meals.

"Residents who constantly ask about a daily walk may forget that they just returned from their walk. A schedule that shows when they last walked and when the next walk occurs can be very helpful," said Saba.

Long-time resident Evelyn Sher in action

They have also created memory books, with pictures provided by families, she said, that draw on past life experiences.

Cohen said specific roles and routines, make residents feel that they are contributing to society.

"One woman loves folding towels, and others match coloured clothespins to bowls, or visit the "glamour exchange" where they can borrow jewelry or try on hats for Shabbat.

"Carol works one-on-one with residents to determine their needs, strengths and abilities, and then finds activities that address these needs. The emphasis is always on demonstrating tasks instead of using words.

"One woman who did not speak, started to sing and speak when she was presented with a baby doll."

She said that concentrating on a task helps people with memory loss feel more secure.

Cohen is dedicated to keeping the method going, she said, and demonstrate that people's lives can be changed. "We want the community to know that it is out there. All caregivers can be trained."

Rabbis express support for organ donation program

Doctors were able to use Jonathon's lungs, kidneys and heart valves – for which the Talbots later received anonymous thank-you notes from recipients: a kidney patient who'd gone off dialysis, children at Sick Kids who'd received his heart valves. Though her family's loss was devastating, Talbot said, "people are alive because of him, and he lives on in them."

Teacher and author Frank Bialystok, a member of Darchei Noam Congregation, appeared in a short video, My Second Bar Mitzvah, celebrating the 13th anniversary of his "rebirthday," thanks to a donated liver. His wife, Ellen, said the donor "didn't just save Frank's life… [but] all of our lives."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, the Ottawa rabbi who chairs TGLN's board of directors, appeared in the video, saying it's "preposterous" for any rabbi to suggest that "a person performing the ultimate mitzvah is going to be penalized" posthumously for giving up organs. This "makes no sense whatsoever."

Following the presentations, speakers addressed questions about donor registration and live kidney and liver donations (only part of the liver is donated; it later regenerates). TGLN only co-ordinates cadaver donations, but in light of the shortage, they can help with financial expenses for living donors.

Levinson said anyone interested in donating a kidney can contact the organ donation program at Toronto General Hospital directly – it's one of the few in Canada willing to accept and co-ordinate anonymous donations. Renewal Toronto (www.life-renewal.org, 416-894-5670) is a rabbinically endorsed organization that co-ordinates kidney donations within the Jewish community.

"If you're considering being a live donor, don't hesitate," Halper said, looking back on the experience that has given her more than a new "sister" in Levinson. Following the operation, Levinson's husband, who'd become Halper's immigration lawyer, sent her for a physical. She laughed, because she'd just gone through intensive screening to donate her kidney, but eventually gave in. That physical turned up a tiny cancerous tumour in her lung, which was removed before it could become symptomatic. She has just passed the five-year point of remission. "It's a miracle of life for both of us," she said.

Netanyahu orders deportation of 25,000 illegals

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered his ministers to accelerate efforts to deport citizens of South Sudan, the Ivory Coast, Ghana and Ethiopia who are living in Israel illegally.

Speaking at Sunday's cabinet meeting, Netanyahu said that while it is not possible to expel citizens of Eritrea and Sudan, whose lives would be at risk in their home countries, holding facilities for them must be built in the Negev as quickly as possible.

A senior Israeli official said that two different groups of infiltrators were discussed during Sunday's cabinet debate. The first are infiltrators from countries with which Israel has diplomatic relations, so no barrier to repatriating them under international law exists, he said. This group numbers some 25,000 of the approximately 60,000 African migrants now in Israel.

The second group is made up of infiltrators from Eritrea, Sudan and Somalia, who cannot be repatriated because their lives would be at risk, according to the official. This group comprises some 35,000 people.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

Sudan is classified as an enemy country, another reason that infiltrators can't be returned there, he said, while Eritrea, though it has diplomatic relations with Israel, considers those who fled the country to be AWOL soldiers, and upon their return, they could be severely punished. Eritrea has a mandatory conscription law for all men aged 17 to 45, and demands reserve duty up to age 55. There are no exemptions. Regarding the first group of infiltrators, Netanyahu said, "Whoever can be sent away should be sent away from here as quickly as possible."

About the second group, he said, "It's clear that we cannot return Sudanis and Eritreans to their countries."

During the cabinet debate, Netanyahu appeared impatient and dissatisfied with the conduct of the relevant ministries and banged on the table several times, according to sources who were present. He ordered a substantial expansion of the Saharonim lockup in the Negev so that it could hold the tens of thousands of people who can't be repatriated.

He also ordered a team of interrogators put together to interview all those who will be brought to the Saharonim facility to determine whether they are indeed entitled to refugee status. The Foreign Ministry has been conducting discussions for several months with the governments of those countries whose citizens can be repatriated, a senior ministry source said.

Israel is exerting heavy pressure on Ethiopia to begin returning its citizens who are in Israel illegally. Ethiopian diplomats have visited the Saharonim facility and interviewed Ethiopian nationals.

The Foreign Ministry has also been in regular contact with South Sudan, whose nationals are being given a chance to return voluntarily. On June 17, a plane carrying some 200 South Sudanese will fly from Israel to Juba, the South Sudan capital. In mid-July, there will be another plane of South Sudanese who agreed to leave but asked to do so after the school year ends.

A senior Foreign Ministry source said that Israel has made it clear to the Ivory Coast and Ghana that the government plans to deport their nationals, by force if necessary, and that if their governments don't issue the migrants travel documents, then Israel will do so.

More IAEA talks with Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

VIENNA — The UN nuclear watchdog and Iran will begin a new round of talks this week to try to reach an agreement to resume a long-stalled probe into suspected atom bomb research in the Islamic state. IAEA chief Yukiya Amano said on Monday.

Amano, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, made a rare visit to Tehran two weeks ago and said that when he returned to Vienna, he expected a framework co-operation deal to be signed soon with Iran.

Western diplomats have voiced doubt that Iran will implement any such agreement with the Vienna-based UN agency, which says Tehran has stonewalled its investigation for almost four years.

"I wish to inform the board that a meeting between Iran and the agency has been scheduled for June 8 in Vienna," Amano said in a speech to the IAEA'S 35-nation governing board, according to a copy of his remarks.

"I invite Iran to sign and implement the Structured Approach document as soon as possible and to provide early access to the Parchin site," he said, referring to an agreement on how to conduct the IAEA's investigation.

The IAEA suspects that Iran had carried out research relevant to developing nuclear weapons at the Parchin military site, southeast of Tehran, which Iran denies.

'Decision has practical and symbolic importance'

Many in the Jewish world greeted the announcement enthusiastically.

Natan Sharansky, chair of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel, called the development a step toward Jewish unity.

"I believe this decision has both practical and symbolic importance," Sharansky said. "It contributes significantly to the strengthening of the relationship between Diaspora Jews and Israel. The Jewish Agency sees this decision as a bridge and as another step toward bringing unity to the Jewish people.

"The government's decision... gives official recognition to these dynamic community leaders and rabbis who work tirelessly to build strong and vibrant Zionist and Jewish communities throughout Israel," Sharansky added.

"We have a long-term goal to have an inclusive, democratic, pluralistic Israeli society," said Rabbi Daniel Allen, executive director of the Association of Reform Zionists of America. "We're going to be patient and persevere until the ideal meets the real. This is one step forward in that effort."

ARZA Canada, the Reform Zionist organization in Canada, applauded the attorney general's announcement, noting Rabbi Gold will be the first non-Orthodox rabbi to be recognized and paid by the State of Israel.

"After a seven-year court battle, which so many of us have supported, it is rewarding to see that progress is being made for a pluralistic approach to religion in Israel. This is a very significant victory for religious freedom in Israel," said Les Rothschild, president of ARZA Canada.

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman, executive-director of Mercaz-Canada and the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism, both Conservative organizations, called the development an important step.

Although only rabbis in smaller communities are affected, it opens the door to the possibility of expanding recognition of non-Orthodox rabbis in larger centres, she said.

"Our hope is that it will keep the conversation going and that Conservative and Reform rabbis are accepted for all communities," she said.

"The Masorti movement is growing by leaps and bounds in Israel" with 63 congregations now part of the Masorti movement, with eight of them added in just the last few years, she said.

"With that sort of growth, you can see that it's also important to Israel that as a pluralistic view of Judaism grows in Israel, the government goes along with that," Rabbi Gorman said.

"This is a big step for religious pluralism and democracy in Israel," Rabbi Gold said. "Israeli Jews want religious alternatives, and with this decision, the state is starting to recognize this reality. There is more than one way to be Jewish, even in Israel."

In New York, the Rabbinical Assembly of the Jewish Conservative movement and the World Union for Progressive Judaism were also among those that lauded the decision.

"This is a historic day for Israelis and Jews around the world," said Rabbi Julie Schonfeld, executive vice-president of the Rabbinical Assembly. "In order for Judaism to grow and thrive in Israel, it is necessary that the government recognize its obligation to provide equal funding to various Jewish religious streams and expressions that flower in the Jewish state."

Natan Sharansky

Yizhar Hess, the executive director of Israel's Masorti movement, said there is a more important issue than the initial number of communities receiving financial support: Conservative and Reform Jews in these areas will no longer have to donate privately to support their rabbis while also paying taxes to support the Orthodox-dominated rabbinate.

This, he hopes, will allow more Conservative congregations to form and reduce the Israeli movement's dependence on donations from America. Three-quarters of the Masorti movement's annual budget of approximately $4.5 million (US) now comes from the Diaspora.

"The only way for a Masorti rabbi to act as a Masorti rabbi was to be able to raise enough funds from donations and dues to make a living," Hess said. "We know that there are more communities that want to reach out and have us."

David Lissy, executive director of the Masorti Foundation in New York, pointed to two recent surveys of Israeli Jews showing increased awareness of and identification with non-Orthodox movements. One, a recent report by the Israel Democracy Institute and the Avi Chai Foundation, showed that 30 per cent of Israeli Jews had attended a Conservative or Reform service.

"More and more people feel that they would like to take responsibility for their Jewish identity," Hess said. "They understand that there is more than one way to be Jewish."

ARZA noted last week's announcement followed other developments advocated by the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Center. Among them, the Supreme Court has ruled in favour of the placement of a Reform rabbi on the religious council of Mevasseret Zion (a town west of Jerusalem); the High Court ruled that forced gender segregation on public transportation is discriminatory and prohibited, and it ordered the allocation of pre-fab units to non-Orthodox congregations for synagogue buildings.

Senate distinguishes between Palestinian refugees, descendants

JTA

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Senate appropriations committee approved language that would distinguish between Palestinian refugees alive in 1948 and their descendants.

The amendment to the foreign appropriations bill, initiated by Sen. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) and passed May 31, requires the State Department to report within a year on approximately how many people are receiving assistance from the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) "whose place of residence was Palestine between June 1946 and May 1948 and who were displaced as a result of the 1948 Arab-Israeli conflict; and who are descendants" of those people.

The State Department had expressed concerns about the language in the amendment, but Kirk prevailed.

"This will have major implications for future negotiations over final-status issues with regard to refugees," said a senior Senate aide involved in shaping the amendment.

Should the Obama or any subsequent administration heed the new requirement, it would deliver a diplomatic blow to Palestinian efforts to leverage their refugee status in peace talks with Israel by aligning U.S. policy with Israel on the matter.

Palestinian negotiators have spoken of a "right of return" of refugees to Israel, and have suggested they would concede this in exchange for a final status package.

UNRWA, the main body assisting Palestinians, unlike other UN agencies assigns refugee status to descendants of Palestinians who fled the area during the 1948-1949 war, although in its definition it is careful to distinguish between the two populations. As a result, five million Palestinians are currently eligible for UNRWA services.

An estimated 30,000 Palestinians would fit the stricter definition of refugee.

The United States is a major UNRWA funder.

Ancient mosaic floor in Tiberias irreparably damaged

JTA

JERUSALEM — An ancient mosaic on the floor of a fourth century synagogue in Tiberias was irreparably damaged.

Some of the mosaic tiles at the Hammat Tiberias synagogue in northern Israel were smashed into tiny pieces and other parts were deeply scratched in an attack that occurred last week. Graffiti also was sprayed on the site.

The damage reportedly will cost millions of dollars to repair.

The Israel Antiquities Authority suspects that haredi extremists opposed to archeological excavations of ancient graves caused the damage, Ha'aretz reported. Graffiti at the site read, "on each grave – a site" and "a response over the years."

The mosaic is the earliest such synagogue mosaic to have been discovered in Israel.

IDF soldier killed

A Palestinian gunman and an Israeli soldier were killed in a shootout on the Gaza-Israel border. The Israeli army said the gunman breached the border fence at about 5 a.m. last Friday. A border patrol detected the breach and confronted the gunman. He opened fire and killed a soldier, and was then killed in return fire. The army said the gunman intended to attack civilians. Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the infiltration, then denied it. Israeli Air Force planes later struck open fields in Gaza.

Israelis quite happy

Israel is among the happiest countries in the world, according to an examination of international data by a finance website. According to the site Daily Finance, an analysis of data compiled by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development ranks Israel as the sixth-happiest country in the world. Israel scored high in "life satisfaction," educational attainment and life expectancy, among other markers. Eighty-one per cent of Israelis self-reported that they were in "good" or "very good" health. Denmark was rated the happiest country in the world. Canada was No. 9.

U.S., Israel developed virus

The U.S. National Security Agency and a secret Israeli military unit jointly developed a complex computer worm that attacked equipment in Iranian nuclear installations. The cooperation, which began in the Bush administration and was accelerated by the Obama White House, may have been part of a U.S. effort to dissuade Israel from launching a preemptive strike on Iranian nuclear installations, the New York Times reported. Israel's Unit 8200 worked with the NSA to develop what Americans called "the bug," the Times report said. The teams built replicas of Iranian centrifuges using equipment provided by Libya's Gadhafi regime when it revealed its nuclear program to international inspectors in 2003.

Should the community still seek public funding for day schools?

Internal and external solutions needed

There's no question that a serious inequity exists when children of one faith in Ontario receive the benefits of public funding denied to all other faiths. The government should act to redress this inequity.

We must recognize that equity cannot be achieved in a vacuum, divorced from Ontario's financial realities. UJA Federation and its advocacy arm, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), support both recognition of the outstanding contribution of faith-based schools to Ontario and the importance of a strong public education system.

Ed Segalowitz

The absence of public funding for Jewish day schools is one of many factors affecting Jewish education and its appeal for Jewish parents. Others include rising tuition and ensuring the highest educational standards through continuous quality improvements. With significant sensitivity to the financial burden borne by day-school parents and their quest for quality, federation's Centre for Jewish Education is exploring funding and revenue options, in addition to working on ways to advance school quality. Federation provides over $10 million in annual tuition subsides to help offset this burden. That's more than the five largest North American Jewish federations combined. Yet we know there's much more to do.

The community has an obligation to seek equity, and the federation, together with CIJA and its predecessors, have led this effort for decades. We'll continue to seek opportunities to advance this agenda where we think we can succeed. At the same time, we believe that a truly collaborative coalition of education community leaders, Jewish foundations, parents and teachers, with the support of the federation that does the most for Jewish education in North America, will be able to directly address the challenges of affordability. No one single strategy will get us there, and no single stakeholder can solve the challenge on their own. Together, we can and must remove barriers to Jewish education and ensure both the vitality and fairness of Jewish education for generations to come.

Other jurisdictions do it

Of course we should continue to seek public funding for Jewish day schools. Our current economic climate is nothing new, and education will continue to be a prime responsibility for every government in the modern world.

Remember that besides providing an extra component of Jewish identity and Jewish education, most Jewish day schools also teach to the Ministry of Education's expectations – in other words, the same curriculum that is taught in every government-funded public school. In many provinces, public funds go to maintain Catholic, Protestant, independent and private schools. Shouldn't Jewish students also be entitled to some level of public funding?

Claire Sumerlus

Our Jewish community has been very strong in fundraising for our Jewish day schools, and our schools owe their existence to the parents who, year after year, reach deep into their pockets for tuition in order to give their children a Jewish education. While we do have bursaries, there are still members of our Jewish community who just cannot afford tuition, and their children are, therefore, at a disadvantage. Public funding would enable Jewish day schools to make tuition more affordable so that all Jewish children have an opportunity to get a Jewish education.

In fact, American departments of education are showing a trend toward charter schools, which are, by definition, publicly funded independent schools. There are currently more than 5,000 publicly funded charter schools in 39 states, each with its own special purpose and enhanced curriculum.

I believe that we need to continue to lobby for public funding for our Jewish day schools. After all, there are precedents for it and there's no question that it would greatly benefit our Jewish students.

Let's face reality

The cost of private Jewish day school is spiralling out of control. I'm a big believer in day school. I attended Jewish day school and high school, but I'm finding the cost to be very expensive and am wondering how I'll be able to send all three of my children there. Where can the money come from to help?

Rabbi Stephen Wise

On one hand, choosing a private day school is a choice I'm making for my family. I believe it gives children an incredible education, a strong Jewish identity, Hebrew and prayer fluency, and a commitment to Israel and the future of the Jewish People. But for this, I need to pay.

On the other hand, public money goes to support religious education for Catholic families, and that seems unfair. Last week, I read about Catholic boards fighting against the rights of students to create gay-straight alliance groups in their schools. How can the government fund a system that doesn't provide a safe environment for all? Imagine how much money our government could save if it had one public school system instead of two. With the savings, perhaps a tax break could be put in place for families choosing a private religious education that meets provincial education standards.

Theses ideas aren't new, but I don't sense that a change in education funding is imminent. Given current realities, we should think more creatively about funding from within the Jewish community. Recently, The CJN carried a great column by Rabbi Jay Kelman about an innovative idea for funding day schools using billions of dollars in private foundations. Looking within our community is more realistic at this time than seeking public funding, and with skyrocketing tuition, we need a solution soon.

An Occasional Feature

We can and we must

We should definitely continue to seek public funding for our schools. Here are three reasons.

• Doing what's right: Do we have a right to give up? Should we no longer plead our case for funding based solely on political calculations and assumptions? No. "Tzedek tzedek tirdof" exhorts the Torah (Deuteronomy 16:20). "Justice, justice you shall pursue." Our task is to work toward what is just and pray that God bestows upon us a favourable result.

Ira Walfish

Everyone realizes the current situation is discriminatory and wrong. Our duty is to advocate for what's right.

• The impact of continuing the status quo without funding: This isn't a viable option. Enrolment in our schools is down, assimilation is rampant, schools run annual deficits, some are in danger of closing and the strain on the parent body worsens every year.

A real solution must be found. In the United States, parents are desperately searching for alternatives. Charter schools or blended learning (face-to-face instruction and on-line instruction) are two examples. These alternatives must be investigated here in Ontario.

• The political landscape: We know our issue isn't popular. However, governments come and go, situations are fluid, and political self-interest can result in surprising policies. For example, in 1996, the Supreme Court of Canada rejected funding for faith-based schools. Yet, four years later, the Ontario government extended various health-care benefits to private schools. Political landscapes can and do change and are often influenced by circumstance. With this in mind, we, the Jewish community, must continue to pursue all avenues, both public and private, in our negotiations with the government. If we continue to advocate for this issue, we can only increase our chances of success. The status quo is untenable. The risk to Jewish continuity is dire. There is really no choice.

Run your career like a startup, entrepreneur suggests

Author Ben Casnocha, right, along with Randy Masters, Toronto chapter president of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) and Tracy Bierstock Wilder, CFHU Toronto chapter board member.

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Author Ben Casnocha credits an oddball schoolteacher with starting him on his journey as an entrepreneurial self-starter.

He was taking a class in computer repair at a middle school in San Francisco, when the teacher, known only as "Mac Doctor," promised his students an A+ if they memorized and recited a poem in class.

Casnocha leaped at the opportunity, but when it came time to read the poem, it turned out to be the text of an Apple TV advertisement, titled "Think Different."

He's never forgotten it – its ode to misfits and trailblazers who can't be ignored, because they move the human race forward.

Its lesson remains valid, Casnocha suggested at a recent event sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. The key to success in a world where our basic assumptions are being upset is to adopt the characteristics of a successful startup and apply them to your own life.

Just as a startup faces a constantly shifting landscape, people too "face uncertainty and change" in their lives, he said. "The strategy that entrepreneurs use applies to us."

Casnocha is co-author of the New York Times bestseller, The Start-Up of You: Adapt to the Future, Invest in Yourself, and Transform Your Career, along with Reid Hoffman, co-founder and chair of LinkedIn. Casnocha was named one of America's best entrepreneurs by Business Week magazine.

Speaking to more than 200 people at the MaRS Discovery District in Toronto, Casnocha said the job/career model of the past 60 years is pretty much obsolete. No longer is it realistic to expect a career climbing the corporate ladder along a pre-determined path, retiring in your 50s or 60s: "That escalator is jammed at every level," he said.

New technologies and globalization have changed all that, for people and for corporations, he continued. Instead, people must employ skills and strategies that allow them to be flexible and adaptable.

Borrowing a term from the world of software, Casnocha said people must be in a state of "permanent beta," a reference to a product that is in the market but which is continually fine-tuned to operate better.

"The product is never finished. It's always a work-in-progress... a constant quest for improvement."

Casnocha suggested people adopt several concepts that are the cornerstone of successful startups:

- Develop a competitive advantage; find ways to do things better, faster, cheaper in a unique segment of the marketplace.
- Assemble a network of allies and acquaintances. Allies are people like you who you can confide in and who provide feedback; acquaintances provide information and job opportunities you might not otherwise find.
- Be adaptive. Successful entrepreneurs need not create something from scratch. Rather, they are often able to bring together existing technologies and ideas in a new and innovative way.

Citing Muhammad Yunus, a Bangladeshi financier and Nobel Prize winner who founded a bank that provides capital to small businesses, Casnocha said human beings are entrepreneurs by nature. People should embrace that and learn how to employ those skills in a useful way.

Entrepreneurs, Casnocha said, are alert to their environment, and where others see problems, they see opportunities.

People have to adapt to change, he continued. "I'm optimistic people will embrace this. I think they'll have to."

Here's one version of Apple's "Think Different" advertising campaign, which debuted in 1997:

"Here's to the crazy ones. The misfits. The rebels. The troublemakers. The round pegs in the square holes. The ones who see things differently. They're not fond of rules. And they have no respect for the status quo. You can quote them, disagree with them, glorify or vilify them. About the only thing you can't do is ignore them. Because they change things. They push the human race forward. While some may see them as the crazy ones, we see genius. Because the people who are crazy enough to think they can change the world are the ones who do."

Israeli-Canadian tours a show about his mother

Michelle Bitran
Intern

In 1999, Itai Erdal packed his bags in Jerusalem and got on a plane to Vancouver to study at the Vancouver Film School. About a year later, he received a phone call from Israel telling him that his mother, Mery, had been diagnosed with lung cancer and had only nine months to live.

Erdal immediately boarded a plane back home to be with her. Ever the documentary filmmaker, he brought along a camera to record the final months of his mother's life – something his mother strongly encouraged. She considered it a way to contribute to her son's future career, Erdal said. She even offered guidance on how to get better shots and which angles to film from.

"My mom was a very unique woman, and her approach to her death was unique," said Erdal, now 37, adding that his mother faced her death with great strength and, with her robust sense of humour and joie de vivre, she continued to be the family's support system. "She was sort of like a rock and everyone was falling apart around her," he said.

After his mother died at the age of 57, nine months after her diagnosis, Erdal returned to Vancouver. He had planned to create a film about his mother, but when he sat down with the footage he had collected, things did not quite go as planned.

"It was way too painful and close and too soon," he said of his first attempt at putting together the film. Erdal decided to put the project aside for a while, until he felt able to return to it.

In the meantime, film work in Vancouver was disappearing, and Erdal found himself working in theatre lighting design, something he had experience with from his work in Israel. As the years passed by, he became a renowned lighting designer, working on productions in Europe, North America and Israel.

Eventually, about six years ago, Erdal got the opportunity he had been waiting for to return to the footage he had of his mother. A friend of his named James Long asked to show some of the recordings as part of a workshop he was conducting on short performance pieces.

Erdal agreed to show the footage and to speak to the workshop's participants about his experience with his mother at the end of her life. He stood in front of the small crowd and translated from Hebrew, adding his own commentary as the images flickered across the screen.

It was then and there that the first seeds of what would become Erdal's most personal and important work were sown. After about five years of writing, editing and hard work together with Long, who became the show's director, Erdal finished the script for How to Disappear Completely, a one-man show documenting the end of his mother's life.

How to Disappear Completely, which was produced by Vancouver's The Chop Theatre and debuted at the 2011 Chutzpah! Festival, features Erdal on stage with a projection of his footage above him. The show is expertly lit by Erdal himself, and, in it, he interacts with his mother's filmed image and tells the audience about her.

"This show is the most important thing I've done in my life," said Erdal, who just completed a run of performances at Toronto's Factory Theatre. He explained that the show allows him to continue spending time with his mother even 12 years after her death, and to show others what an exceptional person she was.

"I think my show forces people to feel things," said Erdal, adding that at the end of each performance, he has audience members lining up to speak with him about their own experiences with grief and about how his show has helped them. "Now my experiences can touch other people, and that's really the most beautiful thing about theatre," he said.

Erdal will be taking How to Disappear Completely to Seattle next year and has plans to continue touring it as much as he can.

Behind the scenes at the National Ballet

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Getting an inside glimpse of the world of ballet is a rare opportunity. But director and writer Moze Mossanen set out to give us just that in his latest film, which captures 10 dancers as they vie for the leading role in The National Ballet of Canada's production of Romeo & Juliet.

"The performance business is about perfection, and here I am using a medium to capture the dancers' imperfections and figure out what makes them tick," Mossanen said. "In the film, you see that these figures of perfection on stage are really quite human, and the things they thought were flaws are really what the audience can identify with."

The National Ballet of Canada opened its doors to a filmmaker for the first time for the movie, called Romeos & Juliets.

"No one really knows how casts are selected, and I thought this was a really great opportunity to show an audience what goes into a huge production like this," Mossanen said.

The film centres around five couples competing for the coveted opening night spot and follows their struggles as they undergo gruelling rehearsals to prove themselves. It premieres on CBC on June 7.

"When we first started filming in the summer of 2011, I had no idea what shape the film would take. It was a daunting prospect at first, given that I'd be dealing with a major ballet company and one of the most significant works ever created in history," Mossanen said.

He quickly realized that the film would stress the dramatic tension of selecting a cast for the opening night show.

"I hadn't heard about the concept of a third, fourth or fifth cast until I started making the film. When I asked the choreographer, Alexei Ratmansky, how it worked, he said they all learn these parts and some never get to play them."

Mossanen, 53, studied at the Lee Strasberg Theatre Institute and the Actor's Studio in New York. His first feature-length documentary, Dance for Modern Times, was critically acclaimed as one of the best dance films ever made in Canada.

"When people tell me I make dance films, it strikes me as a bit strange because I don't see them that way – my films are about stories," he said. "I made my name with a dance film 20 years ago and it's interesting to come back to it."

He is also drawn to stories with Jewish themes. "I did a film a few years ago called Nureyev, based on the life of the Russian dancer [Rudolf Nureyev]. As an Iranian Jew, I identified with his sense of displacement when he was exiled from his country and what he tried to do when he came to the West."

Moze Mossanen

Mossanen said his film provides a unique account of what truly occurs in the ballet industry. "Romeos & Juliets gave me the chance to not only return to the documentary genre but to observe even more closely the enormous physical and emotional challenges dancers experience in their lives.

"The professional life of a dancer is short and pain is a constant companion – yet the chance to enthrall an audience with a vision of perfection is what makes ballet so great."

Singer/pianist Fern Lindzon at T.O. jazz fest

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

It has been a banner year for Fern Lindzon. Just off a Juno Award nomination for her CD Two Kites, the jazz singer and pianist is performing at three shows at this year's Toronto Jazz Festival.

The Toronto singer's first date is as a quartet in a free outdoor concert at the Shops at Don Mills at 2 p.m. on June 23. She'll be performing with Bill McBirnie on flute, Mark Segger on drums and bassist George Koller, who played on and produced Two Kites.

"Bill McBirnie is a breathtaking flautist. It is always fun to feature Bill," Lindzon says.

"It is going to be in the afternoon. It will be more up-tempo and light… with more Brazilian music because Bill is phenomenal at playing it. We'll also be playing some fun standards… some Thelonious Monk."

On June 24, she'll be at Chalkers Pub at 8 p.m. with Mike McClennan on bass and David French on sax. The evening will include longer solos, more instrumentals and a few more ballads.

She performs as a duo with bassist McClennan at Musideum on June 28 at 8 p.m. "It is a fantastic venue. It is like a living room that seats 30 people," she says.

"Mike and I have been playing together for some time now – he has a beautiful feel. We have a really nice rapport. I want the concert to feel like an intimate conversation between, Mike, me and the audience."

Fern Lindzon

Lindzon's repertoire includes jazz standards, Brazilian melodies, klezmer instrumentals, Yiddish arts songs and her own compositions and arrangements, including some Yiddish and Hebrew that she's incorporated into a contemporary jazz context.

At all the performances, Lindzon will play excerpts from both her first CD, Moments Like These, and Two Kites, as well as new material.

Audiences will be treated to the title track from Two Kites, a rarely heard English tune written by Brazilian Antonio Carols Jobim, which she says is a wacky tune with a fun set of lyrics.

Lindzon also plans to include an arrangement of the Yiddish folk tune, Dona, Dona, inspired by a sonata by composer Nikolai Medtner and Hang Gliding by New York-based composer and big-band leader Maria Schneider. Hang Gliding is in an unusual time signature, and that's the same timing that Lindzon decided on to perform Dona, Dona.

She will perform Rodger and Hart's My Romance and has composed a tongue-in-cheek verse that she calls Moon in the Sky, which she sings as a scat. Another favourite of hers is Basin Street Blues, which she has put her own spin on by changing the harmony, making it reminiscent of a steamy, sultry stroll down Basin Street.

Lindzon was the music director of the klezmer-swing act Sisters of Sheynville, and appeared at world music events in Canada, the United States and Poland. The Sisters won the Canadian Folk Music Award in 2008 for vocal group of the year.

Lindzon was commissioned to compose a jazz/klezmer original score for a sextet for Buster Keaton's Sherlock Jr. at the Toronto International Film Festival's Bell Lightbox in 2010. She will perform the Keaton movie music as part of a trio and speak about it at this year's Ashkenaz Festival in Toronto over the Labour Day weekend.

For more information on Fern Lindzon visit www.fernlindzon.com. For the complete Toronto Jazz Festival lineup – the festival runs June 22 to July 1 – go online to www.tojazz.com.

The pogrom in Baghdad is documented

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

In Arabic, the word farhud means a violent dispossession or mass killing.

A pogrom, in other words.

On June 1 and 2, 1941, the Jews of Baghdad were subjected to such an outburst of unbridled violence. Claiming hundreds of victims, it was probably the worst antisemitic incident visited upon the venerable Jewish community of Iraq, whose origins predate the rise of Islam in the Saudi peninsula.

American author Edwin Black contends it was a well-planned pogrom organized by Arabs aligned with Nazi Germany. He sets out his thesis in The Farhud: Roots of the Arab-Nazi Alliance in the Holocaust (Dialog Press), a book that delves into all its conceivable dimensions, and then more.

Black moves massive mounds of material, some tangential, to tell his important story. Since the primary theme of The Farhud is related to Iraqi Jews, Zionism, Palestine, Britain's imperial role in Iraq and Germany's ambitions in the Middle East, Black spends a great deal of time – too much time, in fact – examining all these issues.

Consequently, his 448-page book feels padded and overly long. But if you're patient, you'll be amply rewarded. The Farhud, for all its flaws, is a worthy addition to the historiography of the modern Middle East.

Black, a journalist who has previously dealt with the wartime period in books such as The Transfer Agreement and IBM and the Holocaust, starts cutting to the chase with his chapter on Germany in the Middle East.

Describing 19th-century Germany as "the Muslim's world's non-Islamic bulwark against Europe," he elaborates upon Germany's relationship with the Ottoman Empire and, later, its support of the Zionist project in Palestine.

Reaching the 1930s, he gets still closer to the main subject. Black writes about Arabs who sought out friendship with Nazi Germany, which, he points out, considered all Semites, whether Arab or Jew, at "the bottom of the racial ladder."

In this connection, he zeroes in on the grand mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini, who was eager to establish ties with the new Nazi leadership so as to combat Zionism.

After analyzing Germany's quest for oil in the region, he pivots to Iraq, to which Germany had sold weapons and where a pro-British prime minister, Nuri al-Said, severed relations with Germany at the outbreak of World War II.

The plot thickens when Said is replaced by a pro-German figure, Rashid Ali al-Gaylani, the grand mufti's comrade-in-arms.

By his actions, Gaylani angered the British, whose influence in Iraq looms large. On May 6, 1941, Germany, having received an urgent appeal for help, dispatched aircraft and Luftwaffe personnel to Iraq. In desperation, Britain recruited David Raziel, a radical Zionist leader imprisoned in a British jail in Palestine, for a mission to destroy oil refineries in Iraq and thereby deny fuel to the Germans.

Tragically, he and three comrades were killed near a British military base in Iraq. Several days later, Adolf Hitler declared Germany's support for Iraq and its liberation from British colonialism. This was followed by Britain's decision to land forces in Iraq and Gaylani's and the grand muft's flight from Iraq. Germany was thus denied Iraqi petroleum for its imminent invasion of the Soviet Union.

With Germany's threat to Iraqi oil supplies vanquished, Britain sends troops to Vichy Syria to head off a possible advance by Germany into Syria and Lebanon. The Palmach, a Zionist strike force whose members include Yitzhak Rabin and Moshe Dayan, takes part in this operation. In the process, Germany loses a potential base in the Middle East.

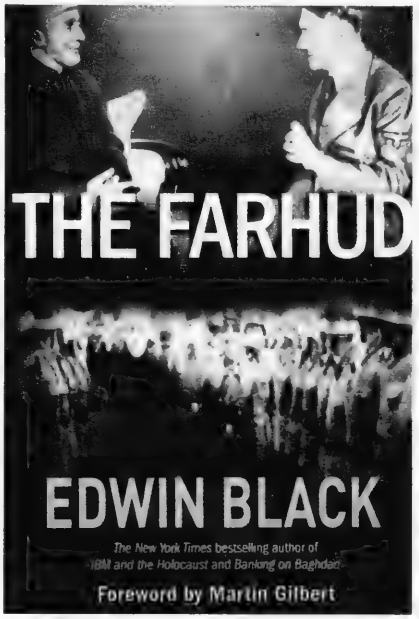
By 1941, 87,000 Jews lived in Iraq and nearly half resided in Baghdad, the capital. Having arrived in Mesopotamia 2,600 years earlier, they were fully integrated into Iraqi society and did not identify with Zionism. "Iraqi Jews, like most Jews in Arab lands, were genuinely anti-Zionist," he says.

Backtracking, Black offers a brief account of Nazi activities in Iraq in the 1930s.

On the eve of World War II, Fritz Grobba, Germany's chargé d'affaires in Baghdad, wired a report to Berlin claiming that Iraqi Jews were agitating against German and Italian interests in Iraq.

Grobba, having converted an Iraqi Christian newspaper into a Nazi organ that had published Hitler's Mein Kampf in installments, warned in his missive that Jews should exercise caution. As he put it, "If the Jews continue to make it difficult for Iraq with their deeds, a day will come when the anger of the masses will erupt, and the result will be a massacre of Jews."

Returning to 1941, Black writes that intimations of a pogrom ominously emerged when Jews



THE FARHUD
EDWIN BLACK
The New York Times bestselling author of IBM and the Holocaust and Banking on Baghdad
Foreword by Martin Gilbert were accused of collaborating with Britain, and Arab mobs broke into a Jewish hospital in a futile search of coding machines.

There is more.

Pro-Nazi Iraqis drew up lists of Jews in Baghdad and marked Jewish homes with blood-red symbols to guide pogromists.

Meanwhile, with British soldiers battling Gaylani's forces, the Iraqi regent who had been recently ousted returned to Iraq under Britain's protection.

He was greeted by, among others, a delegation of Iraqi Jews who had come to pay their respects. Iraqi troops in attendance attacked them with knives and axes, but a planned pogrom dissolved into a spontaneous farhud as frenzied mobs murdered Jews in Baghdad. Women were raped. Men were beheaded. Babies were dismembered.

In many instances, Black notes, regular police either joined the killing spree or declined to interfere. Aghast by the violence, Baghdad's mayor phoned the regent and beseeched him to order loyal army units to suppress the farhud. By one estimate, as many as 600 Jews were killed.

Black claims that the farhud became "a cherished event among Arabs in Baghdad, not a source of shame." He adds that the pogrom was a "turning point in Arab hatred for Jews" inasmuch as it inspired further pogroms in the Islamic world.

"Hitler's war against the Jews of Europe came to a colossal, toppling demise on May 5, 1945, when the Third Reich finally cracked" he observes. "But it continued throughout the Arab world as the forces of hatred refused to subside. It still burned fiercely in Arab capitals as a million Jews in Muslim lands were targeted for persecution, expropriation and expulsion during the several years after the 1948 birth of the State of Israel."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

Novelist Morley Torgov hasn't quit his day job yet

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

For close to 40 years now, Morley Torgov, 84, has lived two distinctly different lives, juggling law with writing.

By day, from about 9:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. five days a week, he practises general commercial law in his downtown Toronto office, handling corporate work, working on real estate contracts and drawing up wills and trusts.

"Once I get home, my law office may as well be on another planet," he said. "It's not hard to disengage from law. I can compartmentalize my life."

At night, after dinner and a drink with his wife, Anna Pearl, and on Saturday and Sunday mornings as well, he assumes his other identity as a novelist, spinning elaborate plots and creating complex characters.

"I won't tell you how many hours I spend daydreaming," he said, suggesting that his professional career may be an adjunct of his love affair with the written word.

Torgov, a lawyer since the mid-1950s, published his first book, A Good Place to Come From, in 1974. A memoir of growing up Jewish in Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., it struck gold, having won the 1975 Stephen Leacock Memorial Medal for Humour.

He rewrote A Good Place to Come From six or seven times, thereby setting a precedent for himself. "The only way to write is to edit yourself mercilessly," he said.

In 1983, six years after the publication of his second book and first novel, The Abramsky Variations, he won his second Leacock prize for The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick, which was adapted for the screen and television as a feature film and a CBC series, Max Glick.

Torgov's next novel, St. Farb's Day, (1990), was nominated for a Leacock award, as was his young adult novel, Stickler and Me (2002).

The novel he wrote between these books, The War to End all Wars (1998), was in part based on his father's experiences as a soldier in the Russian army from 1914 to 1917 in World War I.

"I started off aiming at a Jewish audience," he said in an interview in his midtown home. "But after my fifth book, I didn't want to focus on Jewish topics any more. I'd been there and done, had come to the end of the line and felt I had to branch out."

So, in a leap of faith, Torgov decided to reinvent himself and become a crime novelist. In 2008, the first of his Inspector Hermann Preiss detective novels, Murder in A-Major, appeared.

As he describes him, Preiss is an articulate, clever and sophisticated 40- something German who has transcended his miserably humble origins and worked his way up the greasy ladder of success.

And as its title may suggest, Murder in A-Major is musically infused, turning on a plot to drive the composer Robert Schumann insane and involving his wife, Clara, his protégé Johannes Brahms and a fellow composer, Franz Liszt.

The second novel in the Hermann Preiss mystery series, The Mastersinger from Minsk (Dundurn) is due to be published on June 16 and concerns no less a figure than the composer Richard Wagner and a scheme to murder him on the day of the première of his opera, Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.

To Torgov, Wagner is one of the greatest geniuses of all time, his antisemitism notwithstanding. As he put it, "He has always fascinated me. He was a marvellous musician, but a deplorable human being, a quintessential scumbag."

Torgov is currently working on his third Hermann Preiss novel, the tentative title of which is Key Witness. Franz Liszt and P.T. Barnum, the American circus impresario, are the central characters in a book that unfolds in New York.

As he pointed out, the Hermann Preiss series is steeped in historical facts and based on extensive research.

Morley Torgov

Being old school, he gathers his material from books rather than on the Internet. Amazingly enough, two of the books he still dips into were presented to him as bar mitzvah gifts in 1940.

The Preiss series is set in the 1850s and 1860s, one of the richest and most productive eras in the annals of classical music, when rivalries between composers were sharp and even vicious.

Torgov turned to the crime genre for commercial and personal reasons.

"Detective stories are popular, so I jumped on the bandwagon," he explained. "But I've always been interested in classical music. I started taking piano lessons at the age of six or seven."

Torgov was born in 1927, three years after his father, a Ukrainian immigrant, arrived in Canada and the year he set down roots in Sault Ste. Marie, where he owned two retail clothing stores.

"He wanted me to become a doctor, but my goal was to be a journalist," Torgov recalled. "Law was really a compromise. I had to make a buck."

Not enamoured of its cold winters and remote location, Torgov was glad to leave Sault Ste. Marie, which had 35 to 40 Jewish families in a population of 25,000 when he departed in 1947 to study at the University of Chicago.

Recalling his hometown, he mused, "It was a good place to get out of. It was too confining. I couldn't wait to leave."

As a young man, Torgov disliked the routine and outdated language of the law. "But the older I got, the more confidence I had in my profession."

He has no intention of retiring. "They'll have to carry me out of my office," he said, noting that his law practice has kept him intellectually sharp and in touch with friends and acquaintances.

Writing has fulfilled him, even if royalties have not always met his hopes or expectations. Yet he has no desire to devote himself solely to his pastime. "I couldn't sit in a garret writing all day," added Torgov.

Oddly enough, Murder in A-Major, translated into French, Greek and Korean, has sold more copies in South Korea than in any other country.

"Sales in Canada have been fair. Not as much as I wanted," he said.

His most commercially successful books have been The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick and A Good Place to Come From, both of which have gone through several hardcover and softcover editions. Although not quite as popular, St. Farb's Day, a novel revolving around a Jewish lawyer, was the recipient of the Toronto Book Award.

Since 1984, Torgov has donated 15 batches of his literary working papers – drafts of books, memorabilia and correspondence – to the Ontario Jewish Archives. "Its efforts at storage and preservation have been marvellous," he said. "It's a first-rate organization."

Montrealer revitalizes Canadian snooker

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Watching Patrick Guigui prepare for a shot on the expansive green baize surface of a regulation size snooker table at Le Skratch, a billiards hall in a non-descript strip mall on Montreal's West Island, you'd be hard-pressed to realize that he's on a mission to bring the cue sport "to the next level."

That's the phrase that's posted on his snookercanada.com website, and it's Guigui who is almost single-handedly and methodically reviving the sport in Canada – he's even resurrected its Canadian governing body.

But it's no "fast break."

"It is a lot of work," conceded Guigui, who at 42 is a highly ranked snooker player – he recently won a Quebec class A tournament – and is juggling life as a web-based importer-exporter and as a very busy husband and father of two-year-old twins.

Yet, as Guigui says, snooker and everything about it is becoming an increasing part of his working day.

"Not many people know it, but snooker is the third-most-popular watched Euro-sport," said Guigui, who grew up in Cote St. Luc and attended United Talmud Torahs and Wagar High School.

"It's booming all over the world. In China, snooker is huge, with 100 million players."

Almost more than anything else, Guigui wants to convey to the public at large the senses of refinement, elegance and sophistication that are intrinsic to the way snooker is played and to how tournaments are conducted around the world.

In other words, the game is far, far removed from the stereotypical image of the dank, dark pool hall, with its smelly air and floors sticky from spilled beer.

Snooker is anything but that.

In tournaments around the world, Guigui pointed out, players wear bow ties and referees adjudicate. The game itself is characterized by finesse, and the ambiance at the table and among onlookers is hushed and respectful.

It's "a gentleman's game," Guigui said.

The sport itself, which essentially involves the methodical pocketing of differently coloured snooker balls in a specific order, calls for a larger table – 6 feet by 12 feet – with balls and pockets slightly smaller than other billiard games.

Guigui was so impressed by Mordecai Richler's last book, On Snooker, which seemed to perfectly capture the essence and artistry of the sport, that he recently spent months lobbying for, and finally obtaining, the go-ahead from Richler's son, Daniel, to name a planned snooker tournament after his late father.

It's a tournament that Guigui said he hopes to see played in 2013 at an appropriate venue befitting the image the sport deserves, such as Place des Arts or even the Segal Centre.

"I saw one hall at Place des Arts that would be perfect for it," Guigui said.

At Le Skratch, Guigui has used his influence to get two regulation-sized snooker tables placed in the back room, with space for several more. "I really want to reverse the trend of playing on small tables," he said.

Guigui said he has spent more than a year trying to burnish a new shine on a sport that declined over the last 20 years, in particular since the death of Armand Barbeau, who headed the Canadian Federation of Snooker.

"When he died, nobody took over," Guigui said. "The federation died too."

Guigui's work involved creating Snooker Canada and then seeking and obtaining its recognition by Sports Canada as snooker's official governing body. It has also included seeking potential Canadian television broadcasters for snooker.

Years ago, he noted, snooker tournaments were broadcast (and were popular) on the CBC. Now he's working to get networks such as TSN and Réseau des sports (RDS) to start showing them again – a must for corporate sponsorship.

Guigui is getting a lot of his support from Barry Hearn, a legendary sports event promoter in the United Kingdom who, until a couple of years ago, was the international head of World Professional Billiards and Snooker Association.

Patrick Guigui sets up a snooker shot.

"Snooker is a beautiful television sport," Guigui said. "What I am doing today would not have been possible without Barry Hearn."

It all seems a far cry from the first time Guigui picked up his first pool cue as a 15-year-old teen.

"I immediately saw that snooker was the game I preferred," said Guigui, who actually gave up the sport for 17 years after moving to the United States for a number of years.

Although Richler's book showed him to be a true connoisseur of snooker and reminded the world that deep down, he was also a guy who loved to hang out at pool halls, it was also a reminder of the historic affinity between Jews and cue sports.

Montrealer Leo Levitt was the first amateur snooker player to achieve the maximum "break" of 147, Guigui recalled.

Grandmaster loses tiebreaker

Five-time world champion Viswanathan Anand of India defeated Gelfand, 2-1/2 to 1-1/2, in the four-game rapid chess tiebreaker last week. They had finished the 12-game championship match in a stalemate.

Gelfand, 43, a Belarus native who came to Israel in 1998, won the World Championship 2012 Candidates Tournament in Kazan, Russia, as the fourth seed in May 2011, allowing him to advance to face Anand in the World Chess Championship of 2012.

Anand will take home $1.5 million and Gelfand $1 million (all figures US).

York grads launch bus service to Ontario parks

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

What happens when the only way to access Ontario's most beautiful natural sites requires you to pollute? York University alumni Alex Berlyand and Boris Issaev work every day to answer that very question.

The outdoor enthusiasts have created Parkbus, a not-for-profit network of transportation that connects Toronto to Ontario provincial parks through a system of express buses.

"Not only do we help people get to Algonquin Park, we also allow people to connect via ferry to all kinds of outdoor places in the province," says Berlyand.

Berlyand, now in his late 20s, developed a passion for the outdoors from a very early age. He was only five years old when his family moved from Ukraine to Israel, which he describes as his first real home.

Growing up in Haifa, his family spent weekends exploring the country through hiking trails, which taught him to appreciate the value of his natural surroundings.

"My parents could never spend a weekend just sitting at home in front of the TV," he recalls. "Hiking up the mountains, walking, climbing – it's what led me to love the outdoors so much."

In 2001, Berlyand and his family moved to Canada, arriving just as a snowstorm was underway.

"I'd only seen snow in very small portions on rare occasions, so arriving in Toronto where everything was white and cold was a pretty terrible shock," he said.

Slowly, he grew to appreciate many of the province's parks and outdoor spaces, and wanted to share those experiences with others.

Issaev, also in his late 20s, moved to Toronto directly from Russia. While studying computer science at York, he spent a semester in France and noticed how easy it was to reach outdoor destinations by public transit.

It was this exchange experience that helped Issaev conceive of the idea for Parkbus. After easily travelling across France without a car to hiking trails and campsites, he realized how few options there were in Canada for people trying to get to places like Algonquin without a car.

After connecting with fellow York grad Berlyand on Facebook, the two started travelling together and worked on Issaev's plan.

"It's funny, because Boris and I went to Newtonbrook High School together, but we were not friends at the time," Berlyand says.

"Then years later, it was one of those situations where you have someone on Facebook and you're not even sure how you have them there. I started noticing that he was travelling many places, and I was planning on doing a hiking trail at a provincial park, so we started chatting and nature-climbing together. That's when he discussed the idea of the project with me."

Alex Berlyand

Looking back, the pair had very few resources to launch their not-for-profit.

"We started as just two guys with an idea," Berlyand recalls. "But we knew that a place like Canada, which had so many parks to explore, would need a good transportation network to get there."

Without tremendous capital or experience, the pair conducted research at Mountain Equipment Co-op and launched a pilot project connecting Toronto to Algonquin in the summer of 2010. Soon after, Transportation Option, a non-profit organization that promotes sustainable tourism and transportation in Ontario, adopted Parkbus under its umbrella.

"It was a challenge to really bring all these partners together, and to serve as middle men between large organizations like Ontario Parks as well as bus providers, equipment providers and a bus company," says Berlyand. "But we are incredibly grateful for their support."

The following year, they launched 10 weekend trips to Algonquin Park and secured a two-year grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation. They also received support from the Ontario Ministry of Tourism, Culture and Sport, which allowed them to send buses to Grundy Lake and Killarney Provincial Parks in addition to their buses to Algonquin and Bruce Peninsula.

Boris Issaev

"This is really helping us grow over the next few years," says Berlyand. "We're expanding to new destinations and offering far more dates and flexibility."

Though they don't offer tours, the buses are staffed by volunteers who assist with pickups and drop-offs and help answer passengers' questions.

"I feel like going back to my childhood. Growing up and travelling to all these places and hiking helped form my perspective," says Berlyand. "Being outside generally makes people more active and is something everyone should do more often. We have such a beautiful backyard, so many beautiful parks in Ontario where we can go hiking, take canoe trips. Once I started going, I realized how amazing it could be, and that there are many people here who have never been able to go."

Over time, Berlyand and Issaev realized that their services were helpful for people in very different demographics.

"We originally thought Parkbus would be mostly appealing to young backpackers," says Berlyand. "But it's not just young people. We have had families who live in downtown Toronto who didn't have cars join us, and we even had an 80-year-old."

Berlyand says Parkbus has also attracted a number of international tourists.

"There's a growing number of people discovering Parkbus from Germany or the U.K. who have heard of the park but don't know how to get to Algonquin. There is really nothing else for them to use."

Despite their successes, Berlyand says starting a grassroots initiative has been an uphill battle. The key, he says, is to never stop pushing for what you feel is a worthwhile project or initiative.

"From the start, we had a strong belief in our idea and knew it had potential," he says. "It boiled down to just calling people up, e-mailing them, arranging lots of meetings, being persistent. If you have a good idea, then people will see it as a good idea and will be able to help you down the road."

Looking forward, the pair hopes Parkbus can someday become a self-sustainable, wide-scale transportation network that offers an environmentally friendly way of getting people to these outdoor destinations.

"We hope to reduce the ecological footprint and educate people about a greener way to travel," he says. The two also hope to build a more extensive network connecting Algonquin Park and other destinations to Ottawa and Toronto.

Celebrate all that love

Dear Ella,

I'm getting married in October and my guest list is a bit unusual. In attendance will be my two mothers and three fathers. This happy bunch is the result of my mom's three marriages and my dad's two marriages.

Let me explain. My mom, Linda, and dad, Paul, divorced when I was five years old. My mom remarried, and I was primarily raised by her and my stepfather, Brian. Three years ago, my mom and Brian split up, and she's now with her new partner, Rob.

My dad, Paul, remarried Eve when I was a little girl, and I spent a lot of time with them over the years. What's funny about all this is that I love them all. They are all wonderful people and are important in my life. What's even more unusual is that they all like each other and get along very well at family functions.

Now that you know the background, here's the problem: I want them all to play an important role in my wedding. Larry, my fiancé, is fine with whatever I decide.

Who walks me down the aisle? Can they all be in my wedding party? What about the head table and the speeches? The invitation is a whole other nightmare! It's very complicated, and I don't want to hurt anyone, as I love them all.

Lots of Lovin'

Dear Lots of Lovin',

The addition of stepparents is not so unusual. What makes this unique is that they all get along. Of course, this works in your favour.

For the invitation, the phrase "together with their families," could be used, as there may be too many names to mention. A professional invitation person will have options for you to choose so your wording can reflect exactly what you want.

Now let's tackle the wedding party. Since they're all very special to you, you may want them all to take part in your ceremony. Perhaps the married couples could each march down the aisle and Brian, whom I assume did not remarry, can walk down on his own. Both Linda and Paul will stop in the centre of the aisle while their spouses continue to their seats in the front row or stand under the chupah –your choice. Linda and Paul, your biological parents will wait for you to come down the aisle, and they should walk you up to the chupah.

For the head table, if you want them there with you, just add more chairs. Remember: this is your wedding and you can do it your way.

Speeches can be a little tricky. For the sake of the guests, you don't want too many speeches. Possibly a short toast from some could be an alternative? How about having a pre-wedding meeting with everyone and do a little brainstorming? All the "steps" may even come up with a cute group speech.

An experienced wedding consultant can help with suggestions and proper execution. The most important thing to remember is this is your day. It can be as creative and meaningful as you and Larry want it to be. You don't have to follow "wedding etiquette." You're a lucky woman to have so much love in your life. Celebrate it!

Driving and aging

Last February, the media gave headline-grabbing coverage to the fact that many older drivers are on the road despite problems with their cognition, and it was claimed that doctors are not doing enough to address the problem.

Reports in the Toronto Star and on CTV News stated that the rising proportion of aging drivers with cognitive impairments, according to a Queen's University study, is expected to double from its current 45,000 to almost 100,000 in 2028. In response, some letters to the editor called for swift action, while others said we should be careful not to be "ageist" and turf safe older drivers off the road.

Those of us involved in the care of the aged are aware that driving can be a critical issue in an older person's life in terms of self-respect, independence and the ability to carry out some of their ordinary and necessary activities, such as shopping. This is especially true for those who do not have a supportive family or friend network or live in rural areas. But it's not an easy task for healthcare providers who are entrusted to carry out the Motor Vehicle Act, as it pertains to medically compromised patients, and it carries enormous responsibility and implications.

During a recent clinic, my medical trainees and I saw three patients in a row whose reason for being there included the question of their suitability to drive. As I listened to the case histories presented by the trainees, I realized that there might be an issue with driving. As noted in the Star article, many of these people, like the patients being evaluated that afternoon, were sent to me because of a concern about their cognitive function. When their histories revealed that they were either still driving or had stopped "temporarily," I could anticipate a difficult interview, depending on how much of a "shock" it would be that the issue of driving would be broached when some thought they were coming to me for a "general geriatric checkup."

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

What was of interest in this cohort of patients, all of whom were accompanied by family members, was that bringing up the issue of driving did not seem to come "out of the blue." Some were cognitively intact enough to be aware that there was some "stuff in the news" about driving and older people.

One patient had stopped driving "temporarily" because of what was deemed a short-term medical problem, which in fact was related to cognitive decline, and another said she had already "given thought" to no longer driving. I was taken aback, because she used terms that I often use to help convince patients who are reluctant to make the change while they still think they have a choice. She responded to my mention of driving with, "I am paying a lot of money to keep the car to get me to the supermarket and back."

It is important for everyone to recognize, especially the families of elders for whom driving may become an issue because of cognitive decline, that physicians will have to become more diligent in dealing with patients with cognitive decline. There can no longer be an acceptance of overlooking the issue and trying to "protect them" from the harsh reality of no longer being able to drive. This has to be done in as sympathetic, supportive, but also law-abiding manner as possible. Public safety must always be the highest priority.

Scottish Jews favour tartan tallit, kippot

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Chuck Elnekave loves Scotland. He even took his wife to the Highlands on their honeymoon.

Last year, Elnekave went one step further. He celebrated Robbie Burns Day. Yes, it was a real celebration with all the trimmings, which also included a rare delicacy – kosher haggis.

And so it will come as no surprise for people to learn that Elnekave's store, The Israeli Source (905-482-2025), is the only retail outlet in Canada to carry tallit and kippot in the tartan of the Scottish Jewish clan.

These tartan items are included in the huge selection of Judaica available at The Israeli Source (www.israelisource.com), a 3,000-square-foot warehouse at 60 Doncaster Ave.

It's the place to find unusual items like the Scottish Jewish tartan, as well as a large selection of well-priced conventional Jewish items such as Jewish cookbooks in Hebrew and English, Jewish-themed giftware and novelty items, Shabbat candlesticks and holiday items like menorahs and Chanukah candles, and religious items like tallit, kippot and mezuzot. The store also offers a choice of housewares that include kosher kitchen gadgets that are colour-coded to facilitate kashrut

"We are a hybrid wholesale-retail outlet," explains Elnekave. "We give the consumer the opportunity to shop for all their Jewish needs, other than food at highly discounted prices.

"They can save from 20 up to 80 per cent on their purchases."

Another service the store offers is the opportunity for travellers to buy Israeli mobile-phone packages. People visiting Israel can purchase a phone and SIM card or rent a phone before they leave on their trip, says Elnekave.

The amount of money on the phone can be topped up with a credit card by calling a specified phone number, because calling cards are not recommended for cellphones. If you're planning a simchah, The Israeli Source is definitely the place to visit.

Elnekave says, "We help people doing bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings get what they need for their celebrations like ketubot, benchers, kippot and other simchah favours.

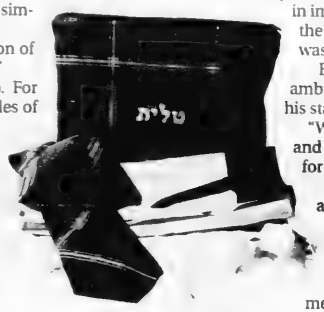
"We take care of the personalization of these items at a substantial discount."

And there's a wide selection, too. For instance, Israeli Source carries six styles of kippot.

Elnekave says many of the gift items sold are handmade in Israel. "I'm interested in finding unique things that you don't see everywhere.

"We try to get as much as we can from Israel directly. We meet up with artists making unique things."

Indeed, he might be walking in a shuk and see an unusual Judaica item, and then he may end up striking a deal with the artisan to carry the item at the store.



Israeli Source has it in tartan.

However, he stresses that The Israeli Source tries to cater to every budget so some of the Judaica items available are mass-produced outside of Israel.

Elnekave and his wife, Barbara, founded The Israeli source five years ago.

He calls The Israeli Source a marriage of his two backgrounds. "We took two things from our backgrounds and marketed them together."

His Israeli-born parents run an importing company that primarily brings in food from Israel, while he and his wife had both worked in the Judaica business. And so they formed a new company that imports Judaica, mainly from Israel.

"I basically know Judaica. My family has the expertise in importing, wholesaling and how to reach the Jewish market. Thus the Israeli Source was born."

Elnekave says his clients appreciate the ambience of the store and the experience of his staff.

"We have a great working atmosphere and that creates a welcoming environment for our customers."

As for the Scottish Jewish tartan, it's an authentic piece of Judaica, says Elnekave.

He explains that a Scottish-born rabbi had a tartan registered with Scottish authorities to commemorate the Jewish community's long presence in Scotland.

"It's a novelty item. People buy it for the fun of it, but for many expatriate Scottish Jews, the tartan is something they're very proud of."

Along with the tartan, tallit and kippot, he carries kilts, golf balls and mouse pads. "The kilt is not a bestseller. It takes a certain kind of man to wear one. It's not in the North American tradition."

A bar or bat mitzvah isn't complete without great party favours or giveaways for the dance floor.

You may have an idea of what to get for your son or daughter's big day, but a visit to the right party supply store can help you stay on budget and choose from the hundreds of items available.

Former DJs Saul Sacks and Dan Jankelow started Incredible Novelties (416-663-9900, www.incrediblenovelties.com) because they wanted to use their DJ experience to help people make the best choice of prizes and giveaways for their child's bar or bat mitzvah.

Sacks said Incredible Novelties offers a unique perspective because all of their staff have been a DJ or a dancer in the special events industry.

Dynamite has great items at competitive prices.

"We understand how our products are used in the environment," Sacks said. "We all have experience behind us, so it helps our customers get the best bang for their buck."

Along with unique experience, Sacks said that Incredible Novelties has items that can't be found anywhere else. That includes a five-pound gummy bear, which Sacks said is the world's largest, as well as unique light-up pillows, yo-yo lip gloss and much more. He and Jankelow carry hundreds of items, ranging from 50 cents to $15, and if you don't see it in the store, Sacks said they can get it.

"People thank us for getting them exactly what they need," Sacks said. "We help make their party incredible and we make sure they're happy with what they got when they leave."

Incredible Novelties offers a unique perspective.

Sacks said that they are able to be so successful because they offer low prices and have great resources. He added that they've gotten great responses from people.

"The best thing people say is I'm telling my friends about you," Sacks said. "It's also great when they say they'll be coming back in a few years for their next kid."

If you have questions about the party favours you're looking for or just need a little help finding what you want, at Dynamite (905-669-7620, www.dynamiteparties.com), you'll get excellent customer services and great items at competitive prices. Owner Ken Gutman said it's important to listen to customers.

"You need to know your budget and I like people to be honest about what they want to spend," Gutman said. "We tell people to bring their children in because they're the ones that know their friends and it's a kid's party."

Gutman has 700 to 1,000 unique items, so he said there's something for everyone. He said some of the more popular items include Angry Bird Pillows, musical pillows and sequined flashing fedora hats.

He added that Dynamite gets a lot of repeat customers and that its most valuable form of advertising is word of mouth.

"The greatest thing is that when one person is happy they talk to their friends in the parking lot and tell them to go see Dynamite," Gutman said.

He added that the biggest change he's noticed in his business is that people are looking for quality items as opposed to quantity. He makes sure Dynamite gets both the right items and the right amount.

"I talk to people to get a feeling of what they're looking for," he said. "We want to make sure that people walk away happy."

Susan Murray International (416-243-9284, www.susanmurray.com) is proud to offer a huge range of linens, many of which have been designed by president Susan Murray herself. All linens are manufactured onsite at their Toronto facility.

Susan Murray offers a huge range of linens.

"We have an ability to understand the client's needs," said Murray. Providing everything from napkins and tablecloths to chair covers, backdrops and other party accessories like napkin rings and tufted pillows, Susan Murray International also partners with florists to help create a full décor experience, with the special design touch of Murray herself.

"We're able to create our own vision," said Murray. Drawing on years of event, hospitality and home décor experience, her team is well-equipped to style any venue.

To further accommodate growing interest in their products, which are also shipped and sold internationally, Susan Murray International is constructing a new showroom and manufacturing facility that is set to open in the fall. The 16,000-square-foot space will feature a showroom with workstations where clients can consult with event planners.

For Murray, having the space to consult and plan is important. As a designer, she is constantly planning the colours and patterns for her linen collections months in advance.

But it's not just tablecloths and chair covers that have to stay on trend. Jack Schnoll, the owner of Kosher & Natural – The Candy Man (416-789-7173), 3193 Bathurst St., Toronto, keeps his tasty event treats matched to your event's colour scheme.

"Everybody is colour co-ordinating," said Schnoll, who has been providing Toronto's Jewish community with a massive selection of kosher candy for the last 30 years.

The latest trend for desserts, especially at weddings, he said, is a colour co-ordinated candy treat table instead of a more traditional dessert table. "Cakes get stale, whereas candy lasts," said Schnoll.

Kosher & Natural has colourful tasty treats.

In addition to the colourful dessert tables, which come complete with loot bags for guests to pack away their favourite treats, Kosher & Natural specializes in renting out candy-making equipment.

They provide all necessary equipment and supplies, along with a "candy man" to run it, turning out treats like candy floss, snow cones, popcorn, soft pretzels and mini donuts. Schnoll said young people and adults alike love the freshly made delights. "Everybody's a child at heart – even the adults."

Pickle Barrel makes party planning easy

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Although many people have enjoyed tasty menus at Pickle Barrel restaurants, not everyone knows that they can enjoy the same quality food at one of the Pickle Barrel's two banquet halls.

The recently redecorated halls are at the Pickle Barrel's Markville and Leslie Street locations and are ideal for both parties and corporate affairs.

"It's very updated – it has new lighting, it has new walls," said Lilli Kazakow, the banquet manager of the Harold Soupcoff Room at the Markville location. The Harold Soupcoff Room is wheelchair accessible and has a capacity of 160 with a dance floor and up to 220 without one, but it can be booked for as few as 75 guests.

At the Leslie Street location, not wheelchair accessible, the Rose Room has been renovated and enlarged to seat from 60 to 120 people, with the dance floor.

"We keep updating as we go," said Tanya Murray, the banquet manager for the Rose Room, adding that, since the redecoration, the hall is "a lot more modern." She explained that bright colours have replaced the muted tones that once adorned the room, creating a stylish contemporary feel.

More than just great food and an elegant setting, each banquet hall offers a unique set of basic and premium party packages that may include everything from an event planner to bar bat mitzvah signing boards, DJ, entertainment, table linens and a complete buffet. Depending on the location, there are options for packages for corporate events, bar bat mitzvahs, weddings and even bris celebrations. The packages give party-throwers nothing to worry about with all the details of the celebration arranged by the Pickle Barrel staff.

PICKLE BARREL

- √ Non Kosher
- √ Accessible
- √ Up to 200 person capacity

Murray said it's the convenience of the "all-in-one" packages, in addition to great service and fresh food, that has people flocking to the Pickle Barrel banquet halls to plan their events.

Some of the enticing fresh foods included in the Pickle Barrel's Ultimate Buffet package are a Mediterranean pasta salad, chicken fingers, a deli carving station and grilled vegetables. The buffet also includes a dessert table, with fresh fruit, a celebration cake and tasty pastries to satisfy any sweet tooth – the perfect way to end off any simchah.

Spiritual celebrations in the Holy Land

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

If your family has a bar or bat mitzvah on the horizon, Avi Rodak's advice is this: consider Israel.

"I can't think of a better place for a bar or bat mitzvah to be meaningful and rewarding for the whole family," says the vice-president of Toronto's Aufgang Travel (905-771-7800, www.aufgangtravel.com), which specializes in travel to Israel. "Whether you choose to have the ceremony at Masada or at another Jewish historical site, it will be so much more meaningful than a one-day party, and it will all be done as a family unit," he says.

Rodak says families considering a trip to the Holy Land should set aside 10 days to two weeks. "You can do the trip in less, but bear in mind that it takes a day to get there, a day to recuperate and a day to get back. So if you're going that far, you probably need 10 days to make it practical."

Travelers heading to Israel need to remember two things, he cautions. First, Israel is a small country, so you can get a lot done in a single day. Second, however, should your trip fall in the winter months, days are likely to be short and outdoor activities will be more limited. It can get dark as early as 4:30 p.m.

What it will cost depends on how you prefer to travel and how many people will be in your party. Aufgang Travel can arrange as many or as few of the details as customers prefer, including flights, airport transfers, sightseeing days with a driver, meal reservations, hotels, rabbis for the service, golf tee times and theatre tickets.

"I can't throw dollar figures on the table," says Rodak. "Every family is different and I need to discuss their expectations of hotels, what time of year they want to travel and how many days of sightseeing they want. There are lots of factors involved, and budget is absolutely one of them."

But there are financial advantages to celebrating in Israel as well, says Ami Lohr, owner of Amiron Travel, Payless Travel & Cruises and Go Israel Travel (416-840-0855, goisraeltravel.com). "The cost is definitely cheaper than handling the celebration in Canada," says Lohr, a former event planner and hotel executive who specializes in travel to Israel, especially for groups, pilgrimages and incentive travel.

Lohr says most spiritual celebrations in the Holy Land involve an average of 50 people. "If you throw a party in Canada and include food, beverage and band, you're running at over $100 per person," he says. "You'll cut your cost by nearly 50 percent by having the event in Israel – air excluded."

A bar or bat mitzvah at Masada is very meaningful

Lohr works frequently to organize receptions for families in premier venues like the Dan Carmel Hotel in Haifa, the Intercontinental in Tel Aviv and the Inbal Hotel in Jerusalem. "As a professional I can work step by step with the client and the Israeli vendors to make an event of a lifetime," he explains.

But for Lohr, Israel is more than just another venue. "By having your celebration in Israel, you get to introduce the country to your children and family as well. You give them the essence of Israel, something they will remember. You cannot compare it to anything else."

The world at your feet: the Roof Salon elevates the Park Hyatt Toronto experience

Park Hyatt Toronto has spent 76 years preparing for your gala event

To set foot in the Park Hyatt Toronto is to stand on hallowed ground graced by 76 years of simchas.

Think the folks at 4 Avenue Road have enough experience to handle your event?

For three generations, this Toronto landmark — a fixture at the corner of Bloor and Avenue Road since 1936 — has been the site of Toronto's most elegant weddings, engagement parties, Bar Mitzvahs and other special events.

In its first iteration as the Park Plaza Hotel, it set a standard for special events that is unsurpassed to this day. When the Park Hyatt chain purchased the property in 1999, great pains were taken to ensure a seamless transition.

How seamless?

Respect for tradition ruled the day. From the heritage fountain at the front entrance to the original wood panelling in the elevators, this grande dame has retained her old-world elegance and charm. Modern embellishments — from the exterior refacing to the world-class Stillwater Spa and Annona restaurant inside — compliment their regal surroundings. But the history requires no refacing. Whether you're a first-time visitor or a regular guest going back to the days of Murray's Restaurant, you can feel the character oozing from every pore of this edifice.

The longevity of staff speaks volumes about the positive energy at the Park Hyatt Toronto. Executive Chef Joan Monfaredi has called it home for 19 years — a lengthy span in an industry known for its transience. Ditto for Wedding Specialist Donald Hillis, now in his 10th year of service.

All Kosher food service inhouse: Kosher wedding cakes and pastries are baked on the premises

Restaurant-style service a hit with guests

But don't mistake longevity for complacency. The Park Hyatt team never allows itself to "get comfortable", says Monfaredi. "We're highly motivated for every event. Our clients and wedding planners always want something new and exciting. We treat every meal like it's the culmination of our life's work."

"The Park Hyatt culture embodies attentive service, teamwork and courtesy," adds Hillis. "But it's not just a mantra; it's a way of life here."

As Toronto's only hotel with a fully operational Kosher kitchen, the Park Hyatt Toronto is one of Canada's only venues capable of handling all Kosher food service requirements in house. Standards are lofty; the finest ingredients are purchased, regardless of cost. Kosher wedding cakes and pastries are baked on the premises.

Monfaredi's talents have taken her the length and breadth of this continent and beyond. She has trained chefs at Hyatt hotels in Curaçao, St. Lucia, Las Vegas, Dallas, Vancouver and Calgary, and has been part of the official Super Bowl catering program the last seven years running.

So focused are Monfaredi and her team on catering to individual tastes that they offer restaurant-style service for most events. This places much greater demands on the kitchen and wait staff, but customer satisfaction has vindicated the practise, says Monfaredi. "The ability to serve meals made fresh to order adds an important dimension to event dining. Each person you've invited feels like a guest of honour."

Notwithstanding the boundless menu options at the Park Hyatt Toronto and the soaring popularity of regional cuisine, a few old favourites remain front of mind among the Park Hyatt Toronto's regulars. Were you to simply glance at the next table and "have what they're having," your main course might consist of a Ballotine of Chicken stuffed with Mushrooms, Spinach and Spanish Onions. Perhaps you'd accompany it by Chilled White Asparagus with Black Truffle Vinaigrette and Shaved Fresh Radishes, and an Arugula Bosc Pear Salad with Lemon Thyme Vinaigrette. For dessert, Molten Chocolate Cake drizzled with Raspberry Coulis and Chocolate Sauce would require little arm-twisting.

The Park Hyatt's main ballroom accommodates 285 guests, but it's the Roof Salon (120 guests) that elevates it above the crowd. The panoramic view of the city is unrivalled among special event venues.

Offsite Kosher catering extends Park Hyatt's reach

The Park Hyatt Toronto's offsite Kosher catering has increased steadily in recent years, and now accounts for a significant share of their business. Their services are in demand at venues needing to serve Kosher meals but lacking a permanent Kosher kitchen.

Adding to the Park Hyatt's destinational cachet is its ability to accommodate your out-of-town guests. This is not just a place to spend the night; it's a retreat that says "Thank You" for having made the trip. The award-winning Stillwater Spa is rated top three among hotel spas in the Continental US & Canada by Travel + Leisure and Four Star by the 2012 Forbes Travel Guide. A sojourn in the Stillwater will make your guests the envy of the bride and groom. Of course, packages including these amenities for the newlyweds are popular and readily available.

For more information about special events at the Park Hyatt Toronto, contact Wedding Specialist Donald Hillis at 416-324-1564. For reservations, call 416-925-1234 or visit parkhyatttoronto.com.

To traditionalists, the Park Hyatt Toronto is like an old friend who neither left the neighbourhood nor abandoned her old-school values. The children and grandchildren of those early guests, who are now embracing that history in planning their own milestone events, are thrilled to discover that what is old is also deliciously new.

One-stop party shops give you a leg up

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

When it comes time to organize your party, there are a lot of things to take care of.

But if you can leave a single store with most of the items on your list crossed off, you're in good shape.

That's the advantage of one-stop party shops such as Party Supply Depot and Cody Party in Thornhill.

"Unlike all of these other places that call themselves 'one-stop party shops,' we do have everything that you need for a party," said Mel Grevler of Party Supply Depot.

"We don't provide music or food, but we do provide everything else."

Having been in business for 22 years, Party Supply Depot has consistently been on the cutting edge at providing for functions.

"We were the first in Toronto to come out with plastic plates, and now we have about 12 different kinds," Grevler said. "There are different appearances, colour schemes, and quality, with some of them looking more real than the real china does."

That's because Grevler puts in the work to find out what is – or soon will be – hot.

"I spend a lot of time travelling to find new items," Grevler said. "That's something important in this business, always trying to find something new. You see what they're talking about in the U.S. or overseas, and then try to locate a supplier for that.

"It's a massive store and you'll always find something new here."

He'll try to find you a good deal, too.

"Almost everything we sell is off-price, reduced in price from the manufacturer's suggestion," Grevler said. "We've tried to give as fair a price as possible on pretty much everything we can."

That includes balloons, of which only the finest will do.

"We only carry the very best quality balloons that are made in America," said Grevler, noting that Party Supply Depot was the first to discount balloons in Toronto. "They last longer and look more attractive.

"That's generally the way we go about everything in the store," Grevler added. "We try our best to give decent quality for a reasonable price."

Cody Party takes pride in being able to offer service to any customer in need.

"You come in here and you're not going to get [us telling you] to go here, or go over there," Cohen said. "Although we're not a party planner, we're able to help you with all aspects of the party, and we're there to help, not just point you in the right direction."

That means being able to provide assistance outside of the store as well, including full delivery and pickup service.

"We have some brand new tents for rentals that just came in, and we're getting ready with our cotton candy and sno-cone machines," Cohen said.

And when you're eating, Cody Party has enough variety so that your paper plates and tableware will blend into whatever colour scheme you're going for.

"We have a huge selection," Cohen said. "Because, for example, we have something like three different shades of green, it'll match into your theme, no matter what."

Cody Party is confident about what it carries.

"We're a bit higher-class of a supply party store," said Jacqui Cohen of Cody Party.

If you're not sure about something, just ask.

"Our sales staff is growing," Cohen said. "You usually see me here, and there's at least one person here who will always know how to help with any event."

Party Supply Depot (http://partysupplydepot.ca/) remains a fixture at 92 Doncaster Ave. in Thornhill. You can also reach the store by phone at 905-764-5457.

Cody Party (http://www.codypartythornhill.com/) is in the Coulters Mill Plaza, on the northeast corner of Clark Avenue and Dufferin Street in Thornhill. Its phone number is 905-669-0060.

Cody Party can help with all aspects of your party.

Feed the hungry at your next event

Michelle Bitran
Intern

If you are looking for a unique way to give something back to the community at your next event, it could be easier than you think. Mazon Canada invites you to set a symbolic table for Canada's hungry at your next simchah.

The organization, named for the Hebrew word for "nourishment," is working to end hunger across Canada. Now in its 25th year, Mazon has allocated more than $7 million to organizations, both Jewish and non-Jewish, which are fighting hunger on the front lines.

Mazon suggests what it calls the "three per cent principle" when it comes to making donations from an event or simchah. Hosts are asked to contribute three per cent of their food costs from the event towards Mazon's efforts.

"We naturally ask for the food cost... It's just a way of remembering those who don't have food around their table," said Ida McLaughlin, national executive director of Mazon Canada. Mazon provides either place cards or table toppers, depending on the host's preferences, which inform guests of the wonderful mitzvah being performed through the simchah.

This coming November, Mazon will be hosting an event of their own to celebrate their 25th anniversary. The event will feature dishes from several caterers and Mazon is extending a special invitation to those planning simchahs to sample the different offerings in preparation for their own events. "It's really a good opportunity to try different caterers," said McLaughlin.

Another opportunity to contribute to Mazon's initiatives is through greeting cards, sent to friends, relatives or acquaintances to mark any occasion. The hand-written, beautifully decorated cards offer a greeting message and acknowledge a donation to Mazon in their honour.

According to McLaughlin, the idea of donating while celebrating is catching on, and people are always looking for important causes to contribute to. Event guests who see Mazon table toppers or place cards, or those who have received Mazon donation cards "are very respectful of the idea and want to do the same," she said.

A Mazon Canada greeting card

McLaughlin added that because Mazon's cause is universal, its urgency is clear: hosts are happy to help and to remember the less fortunate during their celebrations. "People feel really good about doing it. They feel really proud."

Registries offer Judaica and more

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Whether you have an upcoming wedding, bar or bat mitzvah or even birthday, using a gift registry can help you get exactly what you need – and save your guests the headache of searching for the perfect present.

"For years, people would buy presents that you didn't want or they would ask you what you wanted and then get it for you," said Cole Diamond, founder and president of The Gift Network, 416-519-9186, www.thegiftnetwork.com. Toronto's largest gift registry, a free service which allows you to register with over 115 Canadian retailers in one centralized site. They are about to reach their 1,000th registration since going live three months ago.

"The average couple is living together for at least a year before marriage, so they already have the home essentials," said Diamond. "We have all heard stories of fine china piling up in cabinets. People really need to analyze their homes and life situation and understand what it is that they need – and then it's shopping time."

When debating where to register, Diamond recommends looking for registries that offer a wide range of options. "You don't have to stick to just one registry," he said. "The most important thing is to look inwards and understand what you need."

"Couples should also choose a registry that is user-friendly and easy to navigate," said Sarah Zeldman-Novak, giftware buyer and simchah consultant at Israel's The Judaica Centre, 416-256-2856, www.israelsjudaica.com, 875 Eglinton Ave. West, Toronto, or 441 Clark Ave. W., Thornhill. "At Israel's, you can also have someone walk you through the process, pointing out items that you may not even think about but are necessary to start your Jewish home," she said.

Focus on items which will be used right away, but also consider long-term goals.

"While it is more immediately economical to look at purchasing items that may be less expensive, it is also very important to look at the long term and what your future needs will be," said Zeldman-Novak.

"Couples should stick to the basics – you don't need to register for five different challah covers, but you may want to register for a silver Kiddush cup which will last forever," she said.

Diamond hopes to revolutionize the gift registry industry and make it as easy as possible for people to get the gifts they actually want. For example, The Gift Network's "chip-in" feature allows guests to contribute a portion of the price of a more expensive gift.

Guests can also purchase a gift card to use at one of the many stores registered with the Gift Network, including Israel's. "I have a lot of friends who started their married lives living in an apartment. They knew they were going to move into a home eventually, but they didn't know when that would be and what type of furniture they would need in their homes," said Diamond.

"They would just register for a bunch of things they didn't need, and return them for store credit. Instead of doing that, we offer gift cards to the Gift Network which can be redeemed at any time."

Israel's registry is user-friendly and easy to navigate.

The Gift Network has a wide range of options.

While today's couples may be steering away from registering for fine china, traditional Judaica is still a must for every Jewish home, said Zeldman-Novak. "We have a lot of couples who register for sterling silver kiddush cups, seder plates, and lots of Judaica books and religious texts."

"While couples may not be hosting seders in their homes for a few years, they might want to register for a nice seder plate so they have a good quality piece they like and won't have to scramble around at the last minute," she said.

Young couples coming into Israel's are looking for items that are more modern looking, affordable, and of high enough quality to last for years without requiring much maintenance. "We recommend a 999 silver cup which is a good-quality item, less expensive and doesn't require as much cleaning as a sterling silver one," said Zeldman-Novak.

Most of all, choosing the gifts that will enhance your home together should not be stressful or challenging. "Take your time and have fun," said Zeldman-Novak.

A fun place to party

Laura Fixman
Special to the CJN

There's lots to think about when you're planning a simchah, but one of the main things you need to figure out is where you're going to have it. There are a lot of fun locations in Toronto that you may have never considered.

Breakout Studios, 1541 Bayview Ave. (416-787-5668, www.breakoutstudios.ca), a kids entertainment company, was started about a year ago by the owner of Loots Lounge, David Leese. He said it's an all-new concept, and one of the biggest advantages is that his party package is very economical.

"It's an all-inclusive bar or bat mitzvah concept where we include everything for half the price you'd pay somewhere else," Leese said. "It's a cool club venue, five-star service and outstanding value."

Breakout Studios offers professional DJ services, catering, experience staffing, room décor, event production and co-ordination, soda fountains and more. Leese said the most exciting offering in the package is a stretch limo to take the guest of honour and 10 of his or her friends to the event.

"You get all the bells and whistles," Leese said. "We offer the best kids party in the city."

Leese added that they've gotten a very enthusiastic response so far. He said that people know him from Loots Lounge and Factory Lounge, which he owns with his wife, Teri, so they've come to Breakout Studios. He added that there isn't an open spot at Breakout on a Thursday to Sunday night until late June.

Not only does Breakout do kids parties but it also does special-event parties, engagements and sweet sixteens.

Leese said that his kids parties are fun for everyone. "We cater to the kids, but we make sure to host the adults as well," Leese said. "It's a win-win situation."

If you'd like a unique party where you could try something new, Airborne Trampoline Club (905-850-8477, www.airbornetrampolineclub.ca) may be just what you're looking for. Owner Steve Martin said that it's such a great place to have a party because jumping on a trampoline is not something you'd normally expect to do at a party.

"This is actually getting people out there to do a physical activity, which isn't what you'd expect to see from a party," Martin said.

The club generally does parties for four- to 16-year-olds, but it also does parties for adults, such as a recent party for a wedding anniversary. Parties are two hours long and include a party room, can include pizza, and have four coaches teaching simple moves on the trampoline and ending with a big demonstration. Martin said the demonstration is the most popular part of a party.

"They love to watch when the coaches get up there," Martin said. "It's incredibly exciting for them to see what the coaches can do when they get up there."

In addition to parties, the Airborne Trampoline Club offers a competitive program, lessons, group bookings and day camps.

At parties, basic trampoline moves are taught, including how to jump and how to land safely.

Martin said the response so far has been great.

"We offer something very different," he said. "People love that about us."

All your jewelry needs satisfied

Laura Fixman
Special to The CJN

You can't go wrong by seeking an expert opinion when you are looking for the perfect piece of jewelry for your special event, especially your wedding and engagement rings. Several jewelry stores in the GTA offer help making those important decisions.

Lou Goldberg Jewellers, 416-901-0080, www.lougoldberg.com, Ste. 209, 446 Spadina Rd., Toronto, has been in business in Montreal since 1946, and its Toronto location, which has only been open for a few months, offers the same high quality jewelry and service.

Daniel Goldberg, owner of the Toronto location, whose grandfather started the business selling jewelry out of his jacket, said the most important part of the business is developing relationships with the clients.

"You need to be able to trust your jeweller," Goldberg said. "It's kind of like with a mechanic. People don't know much about diamonds or coloured stones, and they don't know much about what's under the hood of a car."

One of the things Goldberg tells people to focus on is the cut, which he said is 40 per cent of the price of the stone. He also suggests that people get something bright that has a good colour.

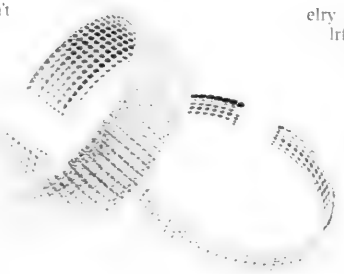
Goldberg worked in the company's wholesale department for several years, and he said he prefers his new position because he gets to deal with the satisfied customers.

"The best part is seeing the expression on people's faces when they find what they were looking for."

Lou Goldberg Jewellers is now open in Toronto.

He added that although the Toronto location hasn't been open for long, they're already getting a great response. He guessed that was because they'd already been around for so long in Montreal, and also because they have a reputation for quality.

"Anyone can buy a diamond anywhere," Goldberg said. "But our passion is beauty and our promise is quality."



Lou Goldberg offers high-quality jewelry.

Lilliane and Robin's Fine Jewelry (416-920-7676, www.lrfjewels.com) is also well established in the community, as it has been around for more than 20 years, since the Hotel Intercontinental where it's located has been in existence.

Lilliane Moses, who has been with the company from the beginning, said that they specialize in one-of-a kind pieces, which they often get from estate sales. She added that they try to help their customers find exactly what they're looking for.

"We listen to each individual so that we can find out what they want," Moses said. "We offer great service and our price is more than extremely competitive."

She added that in addition to estate sales, they cater to what young people are looking for by constantly getting new pieces. Moses said the best part of her job is dealing with different people on a daily basis, but that they also get a lot of repeat customers.

"They keep coming back because they're satisfied with what we give them," Moses said. "We're already on the second generation of customers."

Korry's Clothiers celebrates 60th anniversary

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Korry's Clothiers to Gentlemen was the place to be last month when celebrities, dignitaries and the media gathered to celebrate the store's diamond jubilee.

Korry's 416-463-1115 60th anniversary shindig on May 3 was an opportunity for people to salute Saul Korman, president of Korry's 569 Danforth Ave. for 52 years. He is often referred to as the Duke of the Danforth.

"They used to call me the mayor of the Danforth," Korman recounted. "The mayor Mel Lastman came out to The Taste of the Danforth, one year.

"He said, 'There can only be one mayor in this city. I hereby dub you Duke of the Danforth.'"

Even Tim Hortons and Cold Stone Creamery honoured Korman. Cold Stone – it's located in a number of Tim Hortons stores – created the signature Korry's sundae. This cold treat, a mixture of vanilla and chocolate ice cream, Kit Kat bar pieces and butterscotch sauce, will be sold at 100 Cold Stone kiosks by the summer.

The Zubrowka vodka flowed and the hors d'oeuvres from Terra Restaurant were devoured as well-wishers made speeches and presented Korman with plaques.

Saul Korman, second from right, with his family at the 60th anniversary

On hand were local Toronto city councillors Paula Fletcher and Mary Fragedakis. They honoured him for his tireless promotion of what's known as Greektown.

This stretch of the Danforth between Broadview and Jones avenues is known for its trendy restaurants and cafés and upscale clothing boutiques.

The plaque from Toronto City Council also included congratulations from Mayor Rob Ford.

"I have never stopped shaking hands and promoting the Danforth," said Korman. "It's part of my life."

Indeed, Korry's (Korrys.com) has been a fixture on the Danforth since 1952, when Korman and his father first opened Korry's.

Other dignitaries on hand for the festivities included MP Craig Scott and MPP Peter Tabuns. They both represent the Toronto-Danforth riding at the federal and provincial levels respectively.

MP Julian Fantino, former Toronto police chief, sent two plaques to mark Korrys' 60th.

So what did Korman think of these honours?

"I heard my eulogy," he joked.

He attributed his success to "hard work, good press, combined with charm, personality and empathy."

As well, he stressed the importance of providing impeccable service. "If you take care of your customers, they'll take care of you."

Many people may recognize Korman's gravelly voice on various local radio stations. The store has spots on Talk 640, The Fan (590), CFRB (1010), Q107.1 and The Edge (102.1). These days, however, you can also hear the next generation of Kormans on the air.

Korman's son, Michael, does the spots on The Edge and his younger brother, Shawn, is on Talk 640.

Along with service, it's the quality clothing that draws the customers, said Korman. "We have a great selection of suits, shirts, pants and ties."

And he now sells Cole Haan shoes, so he can provide a one-stop shopping experience. "For the guy that's buying the suit, we have shoes to fit him."

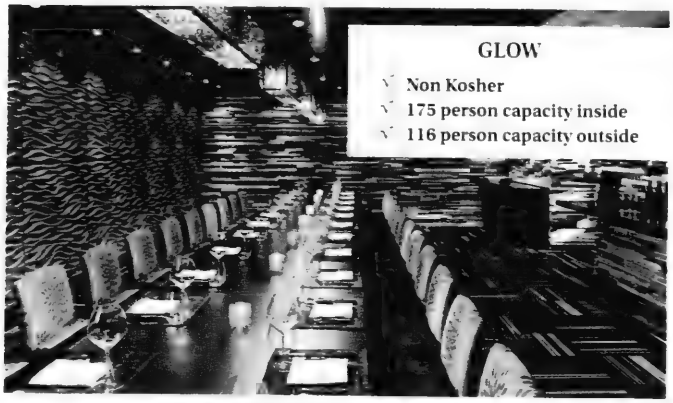
Two intimate venues to host your next party



Glow private dining room

Michelle Bitran
Intern

If you are looking to hold a simchah or family gathering but traditional banquet halls are simply too big for your needs, look no further than two of the city's trendiest and most intimate private dining halls. Glow Fresh Grill and Wine Bar (416-364-1233) and Trapper's Restaurant (416-482-8211) each offers a refined dining and party experience complete with a delicious menu.

Located at the newly built outdoor mall Shops at Don Mills, Glow is the brainchild of healthy-living entrepreneur Rose Reisman. "Rose's philosophy of healthy lifestyle is incorporated throughout the menu," said Jennifer Droznika, the vice-president of sales at Rose Reisman Catering and Glow's event specialist. "We use no creams, no butters, and we are one of the restaurants of this size across Canada who doesn't have a deep fryer," she added.

The many menu packages at Glow are full of healthy choices such as seared ahi tuna, sirloin beef kebobs and warm mushroom salad. They even provide healthy "dessert shooters," which are only between 120 and 160 calories each. "One gives you all the sweetness you need for the rest of the day," said Droznika.

Glow's wheelchair accessible and beautifully decorated private dining room seats 36, and can also host standup cocktail receptions.

For those looking for a bigger space without sacrificing delicious menu options, Trapper's Restaurant may be the right choice. Though Trapper's has been around since 1985, the North York staple has just been revamped. The newly renovated Trapper's dining room can seat 82, and, excluding the washrooms, is wheelchair accessible.

The brand-new décor at Trapper's features vintage Canadian artifacts, including antique blankets traded in the 1800s. Chef and owner Vishal Ramsuchit, a veteran of Toronto's culinary scene, offers an enticing mix of what he calls "Canadian continental cuisine." The menu features fresh Canadian ingredients, including organic chicken from Ontario, veal chops from Alberta, Atlantic salmon, Niagara wine and, of course, pure maple syrup from Quebec.

"At Trapper's, we stand for service and quality – you are able to get professional service and quality food that's reasonably priced," said Ramsuchit. He added that the restaurant's steaks and fish are his recommendations to diners.

The ultimate rockin' venue

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

There's nothing like a party that rocks. And the ultimate rockin' venue for bar and bat mitzvahs is the Hard Rock Cafe (416-362-3636), in the heart of downtown Toronto at Yonge and Dundas streets (279 Yonge St.) next door to Yonge-Dundas Square.

The storied Hard Rock Cafe, known for its rock 'n' roll ambience, revels in music history. The international chain has about 170 restaurants worldwide, but "no two restaurants are the same," says Marcelo DeOliveira (marcelo_deoliveira @hardrock.com), sales and marketing manager of the Toronto Hard Rock Cafe.

"Each restaurant has different memorabilia from rock 'n' roll history, which makes each restaurant unique."

He notes that the Toronto Hard Rock Café (www.hardrock.com/toronto) is the chain's second-oldest restaurant. "We've been at the same location for 34 years." The original flagship restaurant is in London.

Parties and events at the Toronto location are held in a second-floor multi- functional room that can be used for corporate events or as a private party room or nightclub, says DeOliveira, adding that the room has a private entrance and it's wheelchair accessible.

As for parking, there are three lots within walking distance.

He notes that there is a stage as well as audiovisual, sound and lighting equipment, which is convenient for the client and it can also be cost-saving.

The capacity for a sit-down dinner with a dance-floor area is 70 to 150 people, but the room can accommodate as many as 300 people for a standup cocktail reception.

"We do a lot of corporate events for the parents who hold bar mitzvahs here.

"We do corporate events during the daytime – breakfasts, press releases, training as well as a lot of evening receptions for staff appreciation and holiday events.

"We have all the audiovisual equipment corporations need in-house."

The Hard Rock Café is also a venue for wedding receptions, he says. "It's for a very specific client who is not traditional. It's for people looking for a non-traditional style."

The restaurant has a themed décor built around music, he says. "There's no need to go crazy with decorations for an event here. Music memorabilia is a décor theme concept. Familes can incorporate that theme into their events and that makes it easy."

It's one less thing they have to worry about, he adds.

The private party room overlooks Dundas Square, which is sometimes referred to as "Canada's Times Square," and this is a bonus for Hard Rock Cafe clients, says DeOliveira.

He explains that the excitement and energy generated by the events and concerts held in the square often adds to the ambience of parties because guests get a full view of the outdoor event.

He says Hard Rock is also very experienced in working with the various DJ companies. "We have established a good relationship with the largest DJ companies that do these events. For them, it's essentially plug in and play."

The private lounge has its own bar, for adults and children. There is usually an all-inclusive price for non-alcoholic beverages, while alcohol charges are based on consumption.

There are no set menu packages. People can mix and match various items to customize their meals, says DeOliveira. "We can do anything. We have very talented people working in the kitchen.

"We like to work with each family to customize a meal so that it's unique to their event."

Most people choose buffet dinners for the bar or bat mitzvahs with different buffet choices for adults and children, says DeOliveira, noting that two different buffet tables make the most sense because most children do not enjoy the more gourmet adult fare.

However, he adds that you do see a few adults at the kids table helping themselves to fries and chicken tenders. "They're enjoying themselves. It's a party."

Sometimes people choose a plated service for the adults and a buffet dinner for the children, but two buffets are the most common, he says.

The events usually begin with such popular appetizers as mini hamburgers on baguettes, vegetarian California rolls, potato-skin bruschetta or smoked salmon on English cucumbers, says DeOliveira. "We try to offer a lot of healthy options to our customers. The lighter food is for the adults. They don't want to be inundated greasy food."

Other popular appetizers include jumbo soft pretzels with a three-mustard dip and a Mediterranean dip station with hummus and babaganoush.

Choices for the children's buffet include Caesar or Greek salad, sweet potato and/or regular fries, fish and chips, pasta with tomato sauce, chicken tenders and plum sauce and twisted macaroni and cheese.

Adults can choose from such gourmet fare as beef tenderloin, poached wild Alaskan salmon and grilled chicken supreme. Their meals would include Caesar or house salad, vegetable and a side dish like risotto.

There are many options for the adults, and DeOliveira says he plans the menu with each client. "There are no preset packages. We list all items, and I work with the family to guide them through the options."

The family is also invited to taste the meals they've ordered, he says. "Sometimes something on paper sounds great, but it's not what the family had in mind. The meal tastings gives them an opportunity to make adjustments.

"Not all families take us up on this offer, but the ones that do find it useful."

Dessert at the Hard Rock event is served at about 10 p.m. so a sweet table is not necessary, says DeOliveira.

The most popular item is the make-your-own sundae, he says. "We serve vanilla ice cream with six to 10 toppings like M&Ms, gummies, and all kinds of sauces. It's all the stuff that kids love."

The chocolate fountain with fresh fruit is another popular option, he says.

For adults, he recommends plated desserts like the dark chocolate mousse topped with Grand Marnier and Kahlua, a decadent treat made on the premises.

Some families do have a candlelighting ceremony and they bring a smash cake, and DeOliveira makes sure it all runs smoothly. "That's why I'm here."

Capturing milestones with timeless photography

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Wedding photography has changed dramatically in recent years, and that's a good thing for two Toronto photographers who are working hard to capture the special moments in people's lives in updated and unique ways.

"What the younger generation would like to see is more fun, more casual, more interactive shots," said Matt Zielinski of Lifetime Moments Photography (647-993-0555, lifetimemomentsphotography.ca), especially referring to wedding photography. He explained that, while he will usually still take a few traditional wedding portrait shots for clients, most couples want photos with a bit more personality, often in an artistic or photojournalistic style.

For Sam Sciarrino of Horvath Photography (905-707-5770, horvathphoto.com), who lectures internationally on photography, the emphasis is on modernized, fashion-style posing to replace more traditional portrait shots. "What I see and what we're speaking on is more along the lines of what's called contemporary bridal portraits," he said, adding that he focuses on "glamour, good lighting and good composition."

Both photographers do their best to help clients feel comfortable and relaxed during the shoots, which can last full days in some cases and may involve several wardrobe and location changes. "Don't just let the photographer take the photos – interact with them," said Zielinski, adding that he will often pause sessions to show the couple some of the shots, encouraging input, and explaining why certain poses and angles may or may not work.

"It's all about trust," said Sciarrino, explaining that once clients put their faith in the photographer's professional ability, their nerves will disappear and the shots will turn out better.

Zielinski said, "a little bit more passionate, a little bit more intimate shots," are the result of good relationship between the clients and the photographer. He will usually shoot both engagement and wedding photos for a couple, giving him a chance to get to know their dynamic.

Couples want photos they and their families can look at for years to come, said Sciarrino, so it's important to keep the photographic style modern, but not too trendy. "If it's done with a modern flare today, it is a timeless piece."

Finding the perfect gift

Stephen Sweet
Specially The CJN

Picking out the ideal gift can often be difficult, but there are several places that can make it easier.

Shaynee's and the Petroff Gallery are two that provide plenty of beautiful, quality options for any special occasion.

"We represent artists across Canada, the U.S. and Israel, with pieces that are nowhere else to be found in Toronto," said Steven Petroff, who, with his wife, Sara runs the Petroff Gallery.

"We have unique pieces with a wide range of price points for one-of-a-kind pieces of art and a lot of functional display pieces."

They also carry one of the most important items needed to start up a Jewish home.

"We have the largest on-site collection of ketubahs, in a variety of texts," Petroff said. "People can see them online, and then come in and actually hold their ketubah before they buy it.

"As well, we can provide exceptional custom picture framing for the ketubah, so people are able to work with us from start to finish regarding, in some cases, the first piece of art that the couple may choose," Petroff added.

Artsy gifts are available at Shaynee's.

They aren't just for newlyweds, either.

"What's wonderful is that people can choose to do an anniversary text," Petroff said. "It's a modification of the text that doesn't necessarily need to be signed by the rabbi or witnesses, meaning that it can be a surprise gift for anniversaries, which is very special too."

They have items for a wide range of occasions, both functional and artsy, and if necessary, you can take them back.

"We have what's called the approval policy," Petroff said. "People can choose something for themselves, a wall piece or a dining table piece, and they can try it out for three to five days – no obligation."

What they have on display for sale changes frequently.

"Every time somebody comes into our gallery, they notice that it looks different," Petroff said. "Every few weeks, something new is coming in and our gallery is beautifully curated in order for people to enjoy each and every visit here."

And while a number of their pieces are up online, the best place to make a decision is at the gallery.

Stores make gift-shopping a lot easier

"Our website is a very good brochure as well, with very good visuals, but really, it's an invitation to come into the gallery," Petroff said. "It really is a feast for the eyes."

Like the Petroff Gallery, Shaynee's is a staple of the Jewish community.

"People come from all over the city for us because our stuff is a little more artsy," said Shaynee's Schwartz.

She brings in high-end merchandise, including a popular line from Michael Aram.

"He has fantastic tableware as well as a fantastic Judaica collection," Schwartz said. "His table-top collection is unbelievable."

There are different items to be found in the north and south locations – for example, in their one-of-a-kind jewelry.

"Even though we have two stores, we don't put the same thing in each store," Schwartz said.

With the variety of items that Shaynee's carries, Schwartz is confident the customer will leave happy.

"I have a unique selection," she said. "I find that if you walk into the store and you're looking for something and don't see it, you will find something else you like – guaranteed.

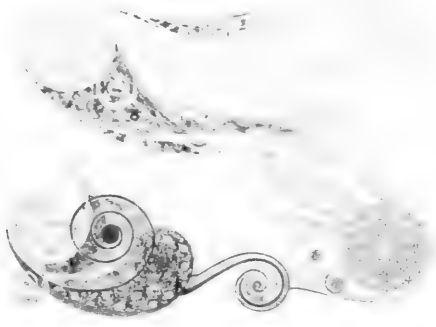
"You will always find the latest in high style and functionality at Shaynee's."

That certainly is the case with its stainless steel products.

"We stock a lot of those, and that's our focus," Schwartz said. "We find they're functional, don't require polish, and they're upscale, sought-after gifts."

She's found that the younger generation seems to prefer this kind of item.

A unique selection is available at Shaynee's.



Petroff Gallery has one-of-a-kind items.

"Young couples aren't really looking for anything that's work-intensive or high maintenance," Schwartz said. "They're getting away from silver and going more toward stainless steel, where they don't have to polish and require minimal care."

But as always, Shaynee's sticks to what it does best.

"We don't try to be everything to everybody," Schwartz said. "We just focus on what's important to us.

"I think we have a fantastic assortment of merchandise, and there's nobody out there like us."

The Petroff Gallery can be found online at petroffgallery.com, and is located at 1016 Eglinton Ave. W., near the Allen Expressway. Phone: 416-782-1696.

Shaynee's has two stores, at 3501 Bathurst St. in Toronto, just south of Baycrest, 416-787-4497, and at 441 Clark Ave. in Thornhill, in the Sobey's Plaza, 905-709-0430.

Consultants can take care of everything

Laura Fixman
Special to the CJN

Planning your wedding or your child's bar or bat mitzvah can be a stressful experience. But if you find the right party planner, they can take care of everything and make your simchah a much more enjoyable experience.

Sharlene Wilder (416-712-9790, www.awilderparty.com) got interested in event planning after seeing her mother work as a wedding planner. She said that she's effective as a party planner because she offers her clients a wide range of contacts and gives them a choice of how much or how little they want to use her skills.

"People can use as much of my time as they need. I'm very flexible," Wilder said. "Where you really want me is on the night of your party, so you can be a guest at your own party."

Wilder offers hourly rates, flat rates and has a full-service package that includes an unlimited use of her time.

She said she offers clients ideas, peace of mind and an extra set of hands.

"I do things like putting together candy tables, which is more of a hands-on approach, and I think people like that," Wilder said.

She added that her favourite part is seeing people enjoy themselves when a party comes to life. She also loves the ability to be creative with them and see it all come together on the night of the party itself.

"I make their party unique to them, how something feels to them is the most important," she said. "I am there to make sure their evening flows from start to finish."

Cherry and Baker and Associates (905-771-1121 tries to customize their service to each individual client by listening to what they need. Sarah Cherry got interested in event planning because her family was in the bridal-wear business, and she said that she and her business partner, Marsha Baker, a makeup artist Cherry once used for an event, make a great team.

Cherry said that they get a lot of repeat customers because they're very honest with clients. For instance, they will tell people if they don't need everything they say they want.

"We want clients to feel that they can rely on us," Cherry said. "We meet with clients multiple times, and we really do our homework for them."

She added that one of the unique things they offer is having a bag full of supplies so that they're prepared if anything were to go wrong.

For example, Cherry had a veil prepared for a bride who forgot hers, and she had extra socks for a groom who forgot that crucial wardrobe item.

She said creating a stress-free atmosphere for the hosts can be very important.

"The day of your event, you don't want to wonder if you did everything," Cherry said. "The night of your event, we solve everything that could go wrong."

She said that they have never let anyone down and that their clients see they arrive early and stay until the end of the event, which is what makes people want to use their services again and again.

"At the end of the night, when they see that everything is just perfect and they can't wait to work with you again, to me that's saying something," Cherry said.

"I'm now doing weddings for people who used my services for their bar mitzvahs."

A bite of delight: chocolate and sushi

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

It's hard to think of a Jewish function without the food. That's why what you serve is so important.

Both Umami Sushi and Chocolate Moose focus on quality and service, whether in day-to-day sales or preparing items for a big event.

"We're a chocolate and candy store, and we do as much in chocolate and candy as we possibly can," said Bev Kruger of Chocolate Moose.

That includes all kinds of nut brittles, caramels, nougat, almond bark and Rice Krispie bark (both quite popular items), as well as chocolate, of course, both in solid and liquid form.

"We have all sorts of chocolate-covered things," said Kruger, listing fruit, pretzels and marshmallows as just a few choices. "Whatever food you can cover in chocolate, we do.

"Everything is strictly kosher," Kruger said. "We do both pareve and Cholov Yisroel. It's all 100 per cent kosher and there's nothing in between."

That allows Chocolate Moose's chocolate and candy goods to show up at many simchahs.

"We cater to bar and bat mitzvahs, offrufs, Shabbos kallahs – any kind of celebration," Kruger said.

And that's because chocolate is synonymous with a pleasant feeling.

"It makes you happy," Kruger said. "At a simchah, people really look forward to the dessert, to the chocolate.

"It gives a lift to the sweet table, or as a giveaway, and people get really excited about that kind of thing."

The employees at Chocolate Moose understand that.

"Our staff is excellent, as is our product's quality," Kruger said. "We try to keep the customer satisfied, and we bend over backwards to accommodate people."

While chocolate has been a staple at simchahs for a long time, it's only been over the past 10 years or so that sushi has made a meaningful foray into the mainstream North American and kosher markets.

"There's no question that sushi has become a staple in Jewish homes over the last decade," said Andrew Novak, who purchased Umami Sushi in 2007 with his wife, Sarah.

"I think sushi at the Shabbos table has probably surpassed gefilte fish as the typical starter to any Shabbos or holiday meal, and it's also looked upon as a healthy meal option."

Those who come looking for nigiri, rolls and noodles from the longest-standing kosher sushi outlet in Toronto range from adventurous to inexperienced, and Umami Sushi can handle the needs of both.

"Our customers are always our top priority," Novak said. "We are always there to answer their question.

"If someone has never had sushi before, we can walk them through all of the options, and based on their specific tastes, recommend to them something that would be a hit."

Novak believes Umami Sushi has some of the best sushi anywhere.

"We have become the primary source for the kosher consumer," he said. "We have raised the bar on quality to a point where our product can compare with any sushi out there, kosher or not kosher."

The dairy-free and nut-free restaurant has a successful noodle menu as well, as the Novaks continue to try to satisfy all of their customers.

"We listen to our customers needs, and have created a new carb-less product called Senken Cups," Novak said.

You can bring Umami Sushi to your event, given that they specialize in party trays for anywhere from 10 people to 1,000 or more.

"Our sushi station can add a level of elegance to any formal affair or a fun, interactive food station at a casual corporate event," Novak said.

Chocolate Moose is located at 2839 Bathurst St., between Finch and Steeles avenues. Its phone number is 416-784-9092.

Umami Sushi can be found online at www.umamisushi.ca and is available by phone at 416-782-3375. It's located in the Toronto Kosher Plaza at 3459 Bathurst St.

Exciting contemporary choices from new kosher caterers

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Two new kosher catering options in the Toronto area offer solid proof that the kosher world really is expanding its horizons far beyond meat and potatoes. Applause Catering with its pareve and meat choices and Kosher Trends which features dairy and pareve dishes.

"One of the things we're trying to do," says Cary Silber of Applause Catering (416-628-9196), is bring the kosher catering level up to restaurant-quality, restaurant-style food people are used to... but doing it kosher."

Applause, recently appointed exclusive in-house caterer to Beth Tzedec Congregation, is leading the way with dishes that are both creative and au courant. Today's diners expect flavourful, exciting dishes like blackened Ahi tuna salad with bibb lettuce and orange and grapefruit sections, honey vinaigrette dressing and Chinese noodles.

"We'll do a dried fruit and smoked salmon salad... it's the presentation that makes them drool. People should look at the food and say, 'Is this kosher?'"

All prep work is done at the main Beth Tzedec location, but from there, the food can go just about anywhere in the GTA. "We work out of The Warehouse, Ontario Science Centre, Bluma Appel Salon, Toronto Botanical Gardens, St. Lawrence Centre and several night clubs, along with the Hilton Garden Inn and Spring Hill Marriott in Vaughan. Applause also caters home, backyard and tent parties."

Applause Catering brings kosher catering to restaurant level.

All food is plated immediately before it's served. "It's not made and held," Silber says. "A lot of kitchens will make up 100 plates, put them in an oven [that] can hold 100 plates at a shot... you're not really getting a fresh-made plate. Everything we do is plated à la minute."

Even though Applause is a new company, the partnership group controlling it brings more than 50 years of experience in the food and catering business. They've branched out into kosher because of what Silber calls "a lack of availability for kosher that people were looking for."

Between the in-house pastry department and the fact that all wait staff are employed directly by Applause – "they're quite familiar with the way we do things" – Applause can take full responsibility for your menu from start to finish. "We still treat it as a hands-on business... we take care of each client with kid gloves."

Applause's strength is in finding what's new in the world of food and then bringing it back to its clients. "We're constantly researching, going on trips to find new things we can turn into kosher."

Dishes like a chicken sandwich served on savoury waffles, or a frozen cocoa butter ball that cracks open to reveal a fresh burst of gazpacho soup, complemented with a mango salsa, show the true range of inventiveness.

"We... doubt the ordinary and create the exceptional," Silber says.

Mona Pasternak of Kosher Trends (416-665-6662) explains that the trend toward fun, casual foods may be in part due to the fact that today's brides and grooms are a bit older. "They're moving away from the typical, 'Let's get married, have hors d'oeuvres and eat a sit-down meal,'" type of simchah. With dairy, she says, "you can be a little bit more creative, have a bit more fun."

Her goal is "to adapt the food to what the client's taste is like." At one function, "everything had to be Asian... everything we did had an Asian flair to it, even to the plating of the cupcakes that were put on dry rice." Other Asian-inspired choices might include Thai salad rolls or stuffed risotto balls.

Another couple wanted an all-hors d'oeuvres meal, so Kosher Trends offered up "stuffed croissants, quinoa in take-out boxes, chickpea salad, fish and chips in takeaway boxes." Kosher Trends also offers a Louisiana "crab" cake entrée.

Kosher caterers expand their horizons

Kosher Trends adapts to the clients' tastes.

Classic favourites like pasta and lasagna are always available, and Pasternak says soup shooters continue to be a favourite. Macaroni and cheese is one "fun kid-friendly treat adults still love to eat," she adds.

With a background in kosher catering with Zuchter Bery and other local food companies, Pasternak decided on dairy in part because she wasn't aware of "any catering companies that just do dairy and vegetarian," although there are restaurants in the community that will do catering on request.

When it comes to creativity, desserts are where dairy can really shine. "There is no one out there that just does dairy, beyond some cheese danishes," Pasternak says, but with in-house baking at its Canarctic Drive location near Dufferin Street and Steeles Avenue, Kosher Trends can delight guests with delicious creamy offerings like cheesecake and cheesecake pops.

In business just over a year, Kosher Trends aims to be a "one-stop shop" for everything from florals to linens. "Clients come to me with their idea, their date... I will be at the function facilitating it for them."

Most events are held in people's homes, and Pasternak will either consult over the phone or come in person to decide how best to set the scene.

And when it comes to food, she says, she's a stickler for presentation and freshness. "Our stuff is very, very fresh. I don't allow anything... out of our place that I wouldn't feed to my family. If I wouldn't eat it, I won't send it out."

So far, that dedication is paying off. "I've built my business all on referrals," Pasternak says. "We make every effort to exceed your highest expectations with the best-tasting kosher food, creativity and flair in presentation."
